

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

The Private Correspondence of David Garrick with the most celebrated Persons of his time. Vol. II. 4to. London, 1832. Colburn and Bentley.

THE second volume of this work has just been completed, and will speedily be before the general public: meanwhile, it is our pleasant task to afford a taste of its quality. Having spoken critically of its precursor of similar kind, we are not called upon to repeat our opinions: others have been more favourable to the editor than we were; and therefore, since it may be thought that the quarrels of actors and actresses, managers and writers, of the last generation, yet possess a greater interest than we, in our wisdom, were disposed to believe,-the best thing we can now do, is to observe, that the present volume is in nothing inferior to the first. Indeed, we have discovered such early matter for quotation, that we begin at page 2.

" Is Lord Mansfield gone to Paris to deprecate peace? He is all-sufficient. Junius has taken the advantage of his absence to give him another stab in the 'Morning Chronicle.'"

Our next quotation is a letter of General Burgoyne's; and it affords a striking contrast between the ideas which persons in those days entertained relating to the privilege of free entrance to the theatres, to what prevail in our time, when every penny and two-penny newspaper writer, and every d_____ farce-contriver, claims his place (quære places?), or denounces his vengeance. The height to which this has been carried is absolutely ludicrous. The very large houses do not feel it much, for they, alas! have ample verge and scope enough for any intruders; but at the smaller houses the demand is intolerable; and most theatrical folks are in such wholesome dread of the press, that they rarely dare refuse the most unreasonable commands. Some scamp sets up a literary concern, which lasts from six weeks to six months, and never circulates out of the circle of its own set-but we be to the manager who refuses to such wights the entrée ad libitum! He shall be unmercifully treated, and all the world-i. e. some hundred and twenty readers _shall know of his misdeeds! We could mention more than one minor theatre where the newspaper press orders alone would fill every seat in the first circle of boxes, and where there are not two tiers. General Burgoyne was more modest.

Lieut.-General Burgoyne to Mr. Garrick. "Wednesday, Nov. 9th, 1774.

"My dear air, - Your obliging and most friendly letter was delivered to me yesterday at the moment I was sitting down to dinner with company, or I should have endeavoured on the moment to return my acknowledgments, with a warmth of expression due to that with which you have honoured me. In regard to the very signal distinction you propose to me of the freedom of the house, and the manner of presenting it, I hope you will permit me to decline the parade, and at the same time believe me truly sensible of the honour of it. I should feel myself as proud to be seated in Drury Lane fete champetre given at the Oaks in Kent on by your deliberate judgment of my talents, as that occasion.' ever an old Roman did in acquiring the freedom of his theatre by public services; but you are at present too partial towards me; and, till I appear in my own eyes more worthy, I must request you to bound your kind intentions to an order for admittance occasionally to your green-room, where I promise neither to criticise your men ill-naturedly, nor lead astray fashion. your ladies. The having contributed the songs and music, and other reasons alleged for my introduction to your rehearsals, will, I conclude, equally pass with the company for this additional favour, without the necessity of any farther discovery. But as you kindly insist upon my directions, I desire it to be done by a simple order to Johnston, and no gold box, nor silver box—not even a mulberry one: you must give me a reception Hamlet-like—I will have no appurtenances of welcome. I think I may, without vanity, congratulate you upon the piece having laid hold of the audience last night. A general relish was very discernible. I could not help agreeing with a critic who sat near me, and who expressed himself delighted with the genteel scenes, that the introduction of the lamp-lighters was too coarse to assort with the rest. Suppose three or four of your girls were introduced in the act of weaving cords of flowers, such as the dancers use in the second act. They might fix one end of the cord to the scene, and keep slipping back as they weave the flowers, in the manner the rope-makers do, which would be picturesque. In that case, O'Daub's part might begin with his conversation with the architect; and he might present himself to the girls in some non-sense like the following: 'O'Daub. 'If these pretty maids would pay me with a kiss a-piece, faith. I'd paint them all round for nothing at all. Sure they look as bright as a May morning already, and a touch of my brush will make them remembered by those who never saw 'em.' If after this the two additional verses of the song were added, the words would apply, and with Moody's action might have effect. Should you approve this idea, or any one like it, the alteration is so short it might be studied and acted in half an hour; but I submit it to you on the sudden, like many crudities with which I have troubled you. Lord Stanley is come to town, and very earnest to see 'the Maid of the Oaks.' I send to Johnston for a box for Lady Betty to-morrow, that she may do him the honours, and I hope I shall succeed. If you could send me the copy this afternoon, I would return it in time for you to put it into the printer's hands to-morrow afternoon. Believe me, with the truest sense of the value of your friendship, dear sir, your faithful J. BURGOTNE." and obedient, &c. &c.

"This was the unfortunate general, but successful dramatist, Lieut.-General John Burgoyne. The piece alluded to was 'the Maid of the Oaks,' a dramatic entertainment in honour of the present Earl of Darby's marriage with Lady Betty Hamilton, and referring to a

These rural fêtes, by the way, seem to have been always very attractive and conducive to " marriage in high life," as well as other agreeable connexions. Our next short letter supplies a happy application of Shakespeare to large theatres :-

So it is, only in a wider sense and degree, now; nor does there seem to be much difference in the capricious tempers of certain performers. Mrs. Abington was an example of the troublesome. Her correspondence by itself is enough to make any body laugh except a manager, and him it must have made very sick.

" Mrs. Abington to Mr. Garrick. "Wednesday Morning, 1774.

"Indeed, sir, I could not play Violante tomorrow if my happiness in the next world depended upon it; but if you order me, I will look it over, and be perfect as soon as possible. Mrs. Sullen is ready; and I am sure if you are pleased to give yourself a moment's time to reflect upon my general conduct in the theatre, you will see that I ever made my attention to my business, and my duty to you, my sole object and ambition. I am, sir, your most humble servant. F. ABINGTON." humble servant,

" Mr. Garrick to Mrs. Abington. " Adelphi, Sept. 26th, 1774.

"Dear madam, -As no business can be done without being explicit, I must desire to know if you choose to perform Mrs. Sullen. The part is reserved for you, and the play must be acted soon: whoever does it with Mr. Smith must do it with me-supposing that I am ever able to be the rake again. We talked a great deal last night, and, I am sorry to say it, without my having the least idea what to do in consequence of it. If 'the Tender Husband' can be done with credit, I shall immediately set to work, and with 'the Hypocrite.' I cannot create better actors than we have, and we must both do our lest with them. Could I put you upon the highest comic pinnacle, I ^{• &}quot;This notice as to Junius is at variance with the received opinion, which closes the public communications of that writer a year earlier. But Camden, I should think, knew that "Roman hand" tolerably well. If he be right, it puts an end to the claim of Francis, who was then in India.—Ed."

certainly would do it; but indeed, my dear madam, we shall not mount much if your cold counteracting discourse is to pull us back at every step. Don't imagine that the gout makes me peevish-I am talking to you in the greatest good humour; but if we don't do our best with the best we have, it is all fruitless murmuring and inactive repining. Something too much of this. I shall write to the author of the piece to-morrow night, which I read to you. I have yet obeyed but half his commands, as he wrote the character of Lady Bab for your ladyship. I must beg of you to speak your thoughts upon that, which after I had read it to you I promised to let him know your sentiments. I could wish, if you say any thing to me of our stage business, you would send it separately from your opinion of 'the Maid of the Oaks' and Lady Bab: with your leave, I could wish to enclose what you say of the last to the author. "David Garrick."

There are some fifty letters of this kind: but we pass to a more singular epistle, giving an account of the death of Mossop.

" Rev. D. Williams to Mr. Garrick.

"Sir,-The most unfortunate event that could have befallen me—the loss of an excellent and affectionate wife-has been the occasion of your not hearing from me immediately on Mr. Mossop's death. I had it not in my power to attend him in the first days of his illness. I found him preparing for death with that extraordinary solemnity which accompanied all his important actions. He had gone through the general forms of the church; but I believe only as religious and edifying forms, and unattended with any discourse on the state of his mind. His conversations with me were the most interesting that can well be conceived; and, from the extreme dejection of my own mind. and the high and tragical tone in which he expressed himself, they made a dreadful impression on me. His religion was tinctured by the characters he had studied; and many of the attributes of God were the qualities of a Zanga or a Bajazet. Among other things which gave him uneasiness, and made him greatly apprehend the displeasure of that God before whom he was going to appear, his behaviour to you was not the least distressing. He accused himself severely of having attributed motives of conduct to you which he firmly believed you incapable of. He had thought himself neglected by you in his distress, and that you sent him terms which you knew he would not comply with, because you did not wish to see him on the stage. He saw that he had been deceived by an excessive pride; and lamented the injustice he had done you, not only in some pecuniary articles, which he did not thoroughly explain to me, but in giving ill impressions of your character to his acquaintance. The very night in which he died, he renewed this conversation. He often cried out, 'Oh! my dear friend, how mean and little does Mr. Garrick's present behaviour make me appear in your eyes, to whom I have given so different an idea of him! Great God, forgive me! Witness, my dear Williams, that I die, not only in charity with him, but that I honour him as a virtuous and great man. God Almighty bless and prosper him for ever!' I of what he had said, as a kind of satisfaction to Mr. Garrick. He was then much exhausted, through the channel of the public papers. But on second thoughts, this method appeared to be the best. Though you may know but little of me, and Mr. Johnston of your theatre was the only person besides who had heard him say things of this nature, I dare say you will not doubt the authenticity of the information. And I think it must give you pleasure, not only as a testimony to your character, which cannot be suspected, but as reflecting some honour on the memory of a man, who, though he was unfortunate and faulty, possessed many great and good qualities. I am, sir, your most obedient humble servant. D. WILLIAMS." dient humble servant,

From death to life is a common stage-trickso presto! for another characteristic epistle, recommending an Italian dancer to an engage-

" Antonio Carara to Mr. Garrick.

" Venice, Feb. 8th, 1773.

"Sir,-'I received the favour of yours, and am vastly pleased to find that you have still the same opinion of your faithful Antonio. Nothing could be more flattering to me than your confidence, placed (give me leave to say) à propos. I have already found out the woman, and have almost settled the affair. She is not handsome, but young. For her figure, one ought rather to be pleased than otherwise; but her legs are superior to any I ever saw_so rapid they are in their motion: she is leadre. and very vigorous, and more comic than serious in her way of dancing. In a word, I think her by far superior to Mademoiselle Hidoux in every respect. Had not our countrymen brought on our side of the Alps the notion of your customs and your wealth, we could have things at a very cheap rate-but now tout est gaté. Nevertheless, for the salary, I hope to reduce her to three hundred and twenty-five pounds, which I think she really deserves :consider, that from Venice to London and back again she is absolutely to spend the third part of her salary. With regard to the benefit, though a stranger to your country, she knows that it is customary, and she insists upon it; therefore, if you think proper to give her the benefit and what I have mentioned, I flatter myself you may have her, though her last word yesterday was three hundred and fifty pounds. Observe that she has here, for the Carnival only, one hundred and forty English pounds. Should these propositions be acceptable, you must be so kind as to send me immediately the contract with your signature, in which you must likewise call her first dancer - conditions ine qua non: for the other formalities, as usual in all the agreements you make in your theatrical contracts. Could you find any person in London to write this contract in Italian, it would be more pleasing to the girl. Don't lose time, because she goes away towards the latter end of next month, and we have not in Italy her second-depend entirely upon me for this. Her name is Paccini. With regard to the men, we have here at present two very good, but their pretences are superior to those of the lady, who, though in my idea at least equal to them, is still more moderate in her demands, being willing to come to England, where she probably expects some other profits peculiar to her sex. The demand for the dancers is four hundred and fifty pounds, which I think exorbitant. Let me know your intenasked if he chose I should make any public use tions about them likewise; but if you have Slingsby, I don't see why you should have two dancers of the same character, as they dance and would only say, 'I will leave it to your grotesco and mezzo carattere. I beg an answer discretion.' My intention, for some days, was immediately, and the contract with the answer, to convey the substance of this letter to you if you like the proposals." Our next is a letter of Garrick's own.

" Mr. Garrick to Mr. Fountain.

" Sunday night (no date). "I am really so hurried with a double share of business on account of George's dangerous illness and absence from me, that I scarce have time to write this. Why will you vex and fret yourself about the knight and what he says? Sir John Fielding.] You praise him one day, and blame him the next: you are an honest man, but too warm; you are likewise a very just man, and should recollect that blindness is a great misfortune, and no object of resentment. Converse and talk over your grievances calmly with your wise friend, and avoid altercation with the Bow Street magistrate -it really hurts you. As for the friend or fiend you meet upon Westminster Bridge, be assured that it is somebody who has been much obliged to me. Let him publish and publish again, and do you laugh at him and despise him as I do, be he as great or as little a being as he will. I fear none of the scribbling pest. If you can see in any body's hands any promise of my brother's given for me, be assured I will at any time fulfil it; but for the threats of sc-[scoundrels], I have had so many, and yet am beloved by the good and creditable, that it is not worth mine or any of my friends' while to listen to their nonsense .- I am, in great haste, " D. GARRICK." yours, most truly,

Our next quotation is from a letter of Steevens', and, with the note, of literary curiosity.

" Let me entreat an audience of a minute. I have nine volumes of your old plays. am not using them at present, but shall want them before the end of the year. Shall they be sent back now, or remain in my custody? I wish you could learn of Capell, if he has ever seen the 'Taming of a Shrew,' 4to, 1607. When he set forth his edition, he had not met with it. It is of some consequence to me to be informed as to this particular. When the 'Taming,' &c. shall have been published, with some others of the same relation to Shakspeare, the original copy shall find its way into a volume which I mean to bind up for your collection. Let me add another query, and re-lease you. I am told that a very extraordinary personage, who is represented to be not a little of a coxcomb, and whose name is A-d-ws, comes often to this place, where he boasts of so strict an intimacy with you, that he spends three days in a week with you, -- that he has a dramatic piece which you are to act, &c. &c. What an author so publicly boasts of, a manager is hardly bound to keep as a secret; and therefore, I hope my inquiry may escape the charge of impertinence. You are too well acquainted with nature not to know the utmost value of every character within its circle, and therefore may find a use for that being, which, to less discerning eyes, appears to have been born only to flatter itself, and be the trumpet of its own praises."

To this we add another memorandum of literary interest.

" Memorandum, Garrick to Sir W. Young. "January 10, 1776.

"I have ventured to produce 'Hamlet,' with

" " Steevens's astonishment, that Garrick should condescend to Miles Peter Andrews, is very amusing to us of the present day, who remember his progress. The commentator accosts the manager, as his own Hamlet does Horatio, on the entrance of Osrick—

' Dost know this waterfly?

Steevens himself lived to see this writer of farces in possession of a splendid fortune, and entertaining, at his palace in the Green Park, most of the royal and noble, and all the wealthy parts of the community."—264.

alterations. It was the most imprudent thing received many letters from his friends and ad-I ever did in all my life; but I had sworn I would not leave the stage till I had rescued that noble play from all the rubbish of the fifth act. I have brought it forth without the Gravedigger's trick and the fencing-match. The alteration was received with general approbation, beyond my most warm expectations. I shall play 'Lear' next week, and 'Macbeth' (perhaps) in the old dresses, with new scenes, the week after that, and then exit Roscius. I wrote a farce, called 'The Irish Widow,' in less than a week."

Having, in this sheet, had something to say of the periodical press of our own time, we will here copy a short correspondence, which throws some light upon it in the days of Garrick.

" Mr. H. Kelly to Mr. Garrick. "Thursday morning, October.

"Dear sir,-On coming home from Drury Lane last night, where I was so highly charmed with your inimitable performance, I wrote a note to Mr. Baldwin, of the St. James's Chronicle, requesting a corner for an account of 'The Chances' this evening. Sending this morning for Mr. Baldwin's answer, he wrote me the note enclosed, to which you will see my answer, and by both you may form some certain opinion of Mr. B. I purpose writing an account to-day, and sending it for to-morrow, either to the Morning Chronicle or to the Morning Post. There is a masquerade, my dear sir, this evening, and I should be much obliged to you if you would give my servant an order for the nun's dress worn by Miss Jenny in the 'Provoked Husband.

" Mr. Baldwin to Mr. H. Kelly.

" Thursday morning.

"H. Baldwin presents his compliments to Mr. Kelly, and will think himself obliged for a short and candid account of the 'Chances.' under the head of Theatrical Intelligence. The want of room obliges him to request it may be short; and he hopes Mr. Kelly will avoid prejudice or gross partiality, though the alteration be the work of a Garrick. H. B. is sorry he was from home when Mr. Kelly's note came to hand.

" Mr. H. Kelly to Mr. Baldwin.

"Sir,-I did not expect an affront where I proposed a civility. There was no necessity to warn me against gross prejudices against, or gross partiality in favour of, any body. account I meant to send, I meant should be a candid one, and thought that when I gave Mr. Baldwin's paper a preference to all others, I was at least to be allowed my own manner of writing. I decline, therefore, the honour of a place so condescendingly offered me, and beg Mr. Baldwin will remember, that if I was capable of literary prostitution, there might be still a connexion between him and his humble HUGH KELLY. servant,

" Mr. H. Kelly to Mr. Garrick.

" Dear Sir,-Infinitely happy have I made two clergymen's families by the two orders.

FORGET YOU I never can. What I owe you FORGET YOU I never can. What I owe you is engraven on my heart. Foolish I am; but ingratitude is not among the number of my vices. The fact, however, is, that the paper you allude to is not yet published. A torrent of advertisements has prevented it till to-morrow, when I shall send it to you certainly. I am, dear sir, everlastingly yours,
"HUGH KELLY.

"In bed. Oh, the curse of bad company!" When Garrick left the stage, he, of course, mirers: we select two wherewith to close this notice.

" Mr. J. Clutterbuck to Mr. Garrick.

cc Jan. 93d. 1776.

"Joy! much joy! to my dear Garrick, for having wound up his bottom so wisely. have made a retreat as glorious as that of Xenophon. (Baldwin, whom I believe you have seen at the Grove Coffee-house, would have written the Greek name Xenophun; because, as he would tell you, it implies being merry and wise); however, I most heartily congratulate you upon the event, and thank you for authenticating the news so much like a true friend. Only let me caution you during the march to beware of ambuscades : for though I see in the list of purchasers four names, yet such is my blindness, I do not perceive one Monsr. Argent-Comptant, whom I should prefer to all the rest; though, I beg Dr. Ford's pardon, perhaps he is the man, and not knowing him may argue myself unknown. I doubly rejoice, because now you may have time to pursue that inestimable treasure, health, and provide against that worst of evils, old age, which I am become thoroughly acquainted with. The vulgar have in many places a notion, that whenever, after the bite of a mad dog, the hydrophobia appears, the unhappy patient, by virtue of an act of parliament, is to be smothered between two feather beds; and if so, methinks it is pity that the act were not extended to paralytic cases, which generally leave the object in such a condition as makes it cruelty to endeavour at a prolongation of his life. But gadso' I forget I am writing a letter of felicitation, and that therefore the Book of Lamentations ought to be kept shut; yet I must on, and tell you that the severe weather hath embarrassed me with a cough of a long continuance, which mars my sleep and blunts my appetite. My dearest Molly, you may be sure, takes the lead of me in suffering, and the frosty weather almost kills her; however, she partakes in your success, and sends her kindest love to both of " Mrs. C. Clive to Mr. Garrick.

" Twickenham, Jan. 23d, 1776-

"Dear sir,-Is it really true, that you have put an end to the glory of Drury Lane theatre? if it is so, let me congratulate my dear Mr. and Mrs. Garrick on their approaching happiness: I know what it will be; you cannot yet have an idea of it; but if you should still be so wicked not to be satisfied with that unbounded, uncommon degree of fame you have received as an actor, and which no other actor ever did receive - nor no other actor ever can receive; - I say, if you should still long to be dipping your fingers in their theatrical pudding (now without plums), you will be no Garrick for the Pivy. In the height of the public admiration for you, when you were never mentioned with any other appellation but the Garrick, the charming man, the fine fellow, the delightful creature, both by men and ladies; when they were admiring every thing you did, and every thing you scribbled, at this very time, I, the Pivy, was a living witness that they did not know, nor could they be sensible, of half your perfections. I have seen you, with vour magical hammer in your hand, endeavouring to beat your ideas into the heads of creatures who had none of their own -I have seen you, with lamb-like patience, endeavouring to make them comprehend you; and I have seen you, when that could not be done - I have seen your lamb turned into a lion: by this your great labour and pains the public was entertained; they thought they all acted very fine they did not see you pull the wires. There are people now on the stage to whom you gave their consequence; they think themselves very great; now let them go on in their new parts without your leading-strings, and they will soon convince the world what their genius is: I have always said this to every body, even when your horses and mine were in their highest prancing. While I was under your control, I did not say half the fine things I thought of you, because it looked like flattery : and you know your Pivy was always proud: besides, I thought you did not like me then; but now I am sure you do, which makes me send you this letter. What a strange jumble of people they have put in the papers as the purchasers of the patent! I thought I should have died with laughing when I saw a manmidwife amongst them: I suppose they have taken him in to prevent miscarriages! I have some opinion of Mr. Sheridan, as I hear every body say he is very sensible; then he has a divine wife, and I loved his mother dearly. Pray give my love to my dear Mrs. Garrick; we all join in that. Your Jemmy is out of his wits with joy and grief; he rejoices at your escape, and cries from wanting to make his own to London: it is dreadful here, but I believe it is much worse there. Pray send me a line to let me know how you do, and how the world goes; for we are rather dull, though my neighbours do pick their way to come and see me. I have since the snow been once out in my carriage; did you not hear me scream?'

In our next we shall repeat our compliments to the work, which has furnished us with these amusing specimens.

The Annual Biography and Obituary. Vol. XVI. 8vo. pp. 476. London, 1832. Longman and

THERE are few occurrences which remind us more forcibly of the incessant ebb of the mighty stream of human life into the ocean of eternity. than the periodical reception and perusal of this work; and we can never close any of its volumes without melancholy conjectures as to the persons, eminent for their genius, learning, or virtue, who in the course of the next twelvemonth may become the subjects of its necrological record. If, however, a nascituary, as well as an obituary, were annually to appear, and if it were as possible for the editor of the former to anticipate what would be accomplished by those who have just come into the world, as it is for the editor of the latter to relate what has been accomplished by those who have just gone out of the world; although such an exposition might not greatly assuage private sorrow, the immortal public would probably, in most instances, be consoled for its losses, by the contemplation of its acquisitions. It is rare, indeed, that the decease takes place of an individual possessed of qualities so transcendent as to leave little or no expectation that the vacancy caused in society will ever be adequately supplied. Far be from us the wish to depreciate departed merit; but in the long list of distinguished persons, the memoirs of whom fill the volume under our notice - irreparable as in all cases the deprivation of them no doubt is to their immediate connexions and friends, and great, as in most cases it certainly is, to the public, there is but a single name_SIDDONS_ which we read with a feeling of utter hopelessness ever to "look upon her like again." many physical and moral qualifications, so much internal power and external accident, must conbe similarly delighted and instructed.

This being our opinion, we are gratified to find that the memoir of Mrs. Siddons (for which the Editor acknowledges his obligation to a literary friend) is the longest and most interesting in the volume. Much of novelty could not reasonably be expected; but that which is known of our great actress is told with perspicuity and elegance; and the occasional criticisms on her various performances indicate refined taste, and a familiar acquaintance with the drama. The fundamental principle of Mr. Hope's be called in doubt, whether, in that country, cosmogony is, that all things are generated by the advantage remain with the man or with time and space:—to these succeed gravitation, centrifugal and centripetal; from which, as the principle of all aggregation and combination, prived; but so imperfectly are they developed, arise the earliest modifications of electricity; namely, those which produce the force of cold, inferior in those physical qualities and in the combination, and substance,—cold being the senses they enjoy in common. Of the original connecting link between mere force and positive races, some, both of the highest and of the substance. Substance, which at first is radiant. consolidates, according to the determining circumstances, into forms gaseous, liquid, and former, the records of ages of the remotest time solid. From amorphous matter, by the action of electricity and cold, is produced crystallisation, the highest and completest form of substances inorganic. By decombinations brought about by the agency of heat, and other recombinations, we ascend by a scale to substance organic and living, vegetable and animal :proving, contrary to the accepted belief, that, after the creation of inorganic matter, another distinct creation was necessary, in order to infuse into the former the principles of life; that in the very conditions of mere time and space, in the very first act of the creation, were already cur in the composition of so glorious a being, former arose, the latter should not, in their Mediterranean adjacent. that centuries may elapse before the world will turn, out of them have arisen. These views, beautiful in form, and exceeds strange as they must appear, are developed in a most elaborate argument, supported by the resources of an imagination highly active, and aided by an extensive reference to authorities both ancient and modern, sacred as well as profane. This is not the place for more than the most rapid summary of a work, to do full justice to which would occupy a space much more considerable than we could, consistently with our general plan, devote to it; but the alleged natural history of man is too singular to be wholly passed over. When, it seems, in other by a comparative scale of excellence, both "The Essay on the Origin and Prospects in physical and in intellectual capacity; the struse disquisition may lead them through the in those regions where Nature has been more ordinary talents and acquirements. Such were the Bible patriarchs before the flood -such the Titans of mythology - such the Præ-adamites of Arabian fable. Next in order of excellence must be placed the stock anciently inhabiting the country between the Euxine and Caspian, to the south; chiefly

These were alike beautiful in form, and exquisite in faculty; by them was carried to rapid perfection all that is in art most rare, and in science most abstruse; and it is according as succeeding generations approach the purity of this race, that they will approximate to an excellence which, deteriorated as they are, they never can hope fully to attain. Pursuing the analogy by which he has, from the simplest elements (elements not vet obvious to the senses, scarcely indeed to the imagination), traced the concatenation to shapeless masses, to crystallised substance, to organisation, to vitality, -till, in the latest and highest link, the diapason closes full in, - Mr. Hope follows the decombinations of this world, to other combinations in a more central and less imperfect sphere, in which they will be absorbed; forming there an entity comprehending all modifications, inanimate and animate, inorganised and organic, vegetable and animal, sentient and intellectual, from the first and simplest to the last and highest, on which it was founded. Such are the speculations of a writer, long holding a distinguished place among the authors of the day, but in a department of literature so distinct from that which occupied his latter years, that few, in perusing them, would recognise the author of those works on art, and above all, of that splendid fiction by of Man,' published posthumously, is only a pre-former, if not determining the latter, at least which Mr. Hope is chiefly known. The Invasion. By the Author of "the Collegians," &c. 4 vols. London, 1832. Saunders and Otley.

MUCH of time and talent has been bestowed on these pages, and we fear in vain. An epic, a novel, a treatise on political economy, and an antiquarian essay, are materials that do not assimilate. We will first allow our author to speak for himself, and then say why we think his efforts will not be rewarded by popularity.

"It would be dealing unjustly both by reader and author, to suffer the former to take up these volumes under the idea that he is about to peruse a historical novel. That branch of literature has, within our own day, attained a rank in which, we are sensible, the present performance could not, for an instant, maintain its ground. To the absorbing interest excited by deep passion, dramatic dialogue, and laid the seeds of its last and highest develop- known by the colony which, under the name of highly wrought narrative, these volumes have ments, not only vital, but sensitive and intel- Pelagians, Hellenes, and Dorians, settled in not a pretension. surface of society in part of England, in Ireland, | inflict the punishment of half-hanging, or even | small and hunch-backed; his features sharp; and in northern Europe, at an obscure period of the history of mankind." He concludes by saying, "Do not, either from indolence or prejudice, decry what has been constructed with difficult to shew, from a variety of passages care and study; and remember that what is uninteresting to one class of readers, may be we pause too long on questions of law and government, remember that there are Irish readers who may not regret to find embodied, in a work of imagination, a synopsis of the early constitution, and of the moral history of their native land, and who may regard with an interest more permanent, if not more exciting, than that which addresses itself to the passions, an attempt at tracing, to their remotest origin, some of the influences which have concurred in the formation of the national character.

Unfortunately the great mass of readers will ask for something of interest, and in that the narrative is utterly deficient. Much knowledge is displayed, and little invention; the antiquary has overlaid the author. The general reader should have a dictionary at his side. What can we say to passages like the following? "They were followed by the brehoun, or lawyer of the sept, a man proficient in all the laws of life and property, megbote, manbote, and fredun, thanistry, gavelkind, musterowne, south, assaut, bode, garty, cean, byenge, slancingh, shragh, and a thousand other details of the ancient code of Inisfail.

"The wild stuic sent its blast over the tranquil waters; the winding adharcaidh ciuil, a kind of hautboy, awoke the echoes of the shore; the shrill piob-mala, or droneless bagpipe, contributed its monotonous treble; the dudog, the lonloingean, the adharc, the cuisleigh civil, the fideog, the corn-bean, and other instruments of wind music."

We, however, scarcely venture to cavil: for our author in his preface observes, "that from the really well-informed we fear nothing; from the ignorant every thing."

Constable's Miscellany, Vol. LXXIV. The Civil Wars of Ireland. By W. C. Taylor, Esq., A.B., of Trinity College, Dublin. Vol. II. Edinburgh, 1831, Constable and Co.; London, Hurst, Chance, and Co.
To the first volume of Mr. Taylor's work we gave our qualified commendation in the Literary Gazette, No. 774. To the second and concluding volume, which brings down the history of Ireland from the Cromwellian invasion to the union with England, we are inclined to accord higher, although still exceptionable praise. We believe Mr. Taylor to be perfectly sincere in his desire to do justice to all sects and parties; but it is evident to us, that his zeal to display this important qualification in the historian. has run away with his cooler judgment, and has led him to repeat, as historical facts, anecdotes obviously fabricated by one side to throw disrepute upon the other. For instance, we readily grant the disgusting cruelties practised in the rebellion of 1798; but the atrocities of a sergeant of the North Cork militia, nicknamed Tom the Devil, rather exceed the extent of our belief, especially when Mr. Taylor follows up the relation by informing us that "A tall officer in the same regiment acquired the name of The Walking Gallows, from consenting to become, on several occa-sions, a substitute for a gibbet, when it was deemed necessary, in an inconvenient place, to death."

If we were inclined to force a political obiect from Mr. Taylor's work, it would not be and arguments in the volume before us, that the repeal of the union - a question which has been for some time past, and is now, fiercely agitated in Ireland—a prospect "bright with promise," to use Mr. Taylor's concluding words is strongly, although indirectly and cautiously. advocated. Thus, at page 66, Mr. Taylor says that "the Cromwellian administration may fairly challenge a comparison with the best of those by which it was preceded, and with many of those that followed, so far as the supreme government was concerned;" and yet at page 79 he asserts that "it was a settled maxim. in what may be called the political economy of the day, that Ireland should be systematically depressed, in order to prevent her from becoming a formidable rival of England. Her great natural resources, her fertile soil, her noble rivers, her capacious harbours, were viewed with jealousy and suspicion, as means of securing future independence, and raising her to an eminence that would eclipse the glory of her illustrious rival. The Puritans promised to avert this terrible consummation. They offered, if their ascendency was secured, to crush the energies of Ireland, to render the bounties of Providence unavailing, to produce wretched ness where God had given plenty, and to spread desolation where nature had created a paradise. The English accepted the offer; and the Cromwellians kept their promise to the letter.

However we may differ from Mr. Taylor in the conclusion which we have just quoted, the view taken by him of the character of the Cromwellian adventurers, and of their settlement in Ireland, is one of the most correct and vivid sketches with which we remember to have met of this important colonisation of the sister island. We regret that it should be disfigured by the Joe Miller's introduced at p. 80; but as Mr. Taylor appears to us to be acquainted with but half of one of these stories, suppose we finish it for him. It will, however, first be necessary to quote this anecdote, intended to illustrate the ignorance of the Cromwellian magistracy.

"A worthy magistrate having occasion to write the word 'usage,' contrived to spell it without using a single letter of the original word; his improved orthography was youzitch. When some remarks were made on similar feats, he averred that 'nobody could spell with pens made from the quills of Irish geese!"

Now, does Mr. Taylor know the name of this worthy, who thus wrote himself down an ass? If not, we can inform him that he was ycleped Isaac Jacob, and was the founder of respectable Quaker family in the county of Waterford. His name is preserved by the gentleman who had received this yowzitch at his hand, addressing his reply to Yzike Yckup: thus spelling two words without using a single letter of either ;-but the story rests upon no better authority than our aforesaid friend, Mr. Joseph Miller, of facetious memory. On the whole, we are so well pleased with Mr. Taylor's performance, that we will no longer play the schoolmaster, but proceed to select a few anecdotes from his pages.

An Irish General .- " Teague O'Regan, the governor of Charlemont, was a brave old veteran, in the seventieth year of his age. He was a quaint humorist; his figure seemed moulded by nature in one of her most whimsical moods; and it was his pleasure to render his gait irregular. He wore a grizzly wig, of formidable dimensions; a white hat, with an immense feather, a scarlet coat, huge jack-boots, and a cloak that might have served a giant. He was fond of riding; and the horse which he selected was scarcely to be matched for viciousness and deformity. Schomberg, who was himself a little eccentric, took an amazing fancy to the character of Teague O'Regan, and offered the garrison the most favourable conditions. O'Regan's answer was characteristic; he simply replied, 'That old knave Schomberg shall not have this castle!' A detachment of 500 men brought O'Regan a very insufficient supply of ammunition and provision, which he feared that they would soon consume if admitted into the garrison; and he therefore directed them to force their way back through the English lines. they attempted, but were repulsed with loss: and as O'Regan would not admit them into the castle, they were forced to take up their quarters on the counterscarp. The consequences may easily be forseen; provisions were soon exhausted, and the garrison compelled to capitulate. Schomberg granted the best terms, and, when he met the governor, invited him to dinner. During the repast, an Irish priest of the town entered into an argument with an English dragoon on the difficult subject of transubstantiation.' From words the disputants soon came to blows; and a messenger was sent to inform O'Regan of the breach of the capitulation, by the ill treatment of the priest. O'Regan heard the story with great gravity, and coolly replied; 'Served him right; what the deuce business had a priest to begin an argument with a dragoon?' - a jest which had the happy effect of restoring all parties to good humour.

Irish Patriots .- " The first cause of dispute between the leaders of the Irish patriots, was with respect to securing the newly-acquired independence of their legislature. Mr. Flood, and a small but active party, asserted, that the simple repeal of the declaratory acts asserting the supremacy of the British parliament, was insufficient, because the claim of right was not expressly conceded. On the other hand, Mr. Grattan, with an overwhelming majority, contended that, under all the circumstances of the case, the simple repeal was a virtual renunciation of all British legislative and judicial authority over Ireland. The point at issue was, practically, of little moment; but the vigour and virulence with which it was contested raised it into importance. The sarcasms interchanged between the leaders were unequalled in the annals of vituperative eloquence. Flood described his opponent as 'the mendicant patriot who was bought by his country for money, and then sold that country for prompt payment.' Grattan described his antagonist as 'an ominous bird of prey with cadaverous aspect, sepulchral notes and broken beak, meditating to pounce upon his quarry.' He divided his political life into three periods, and said, that 'in the first he was intemperate; in the second corrupt; in the last seditions: and, after a bitter exposure of the whole course of Flood's public career, concluded thus: 'Such has been your conduct, and, at such conduct, every order of your fellow-subjects have a right to exclaim. merchant may say to you, the constitutionalist may say to you, the American may say to you, and I now say to you, and say to your heard, Sir! you are not an honest man!"

An Irish Mob Riot. - "The fear of a union it still more ridiculous by his dress. He was was a more justifiable cause of tumult, because it was manifest that the removal of the parliament would greatly injure the trade of the Dublin shopkeepers. The proceedings of the mob were very characteristic of the humour which distinguishes the Irish. They forced which distinguishes the Irish. their way into the House of Lords, seated an old woman on the throne, and got up a mock debate on the expediency of introducing pipes and tobacco. They forced the members of both houses whom they met, to swear that they would never consent to a union, nor give a vote against the interests of Ireland. They compelled the chief-justice of the King's Bench to administer this oath to the attorney-general, and laughed heartily at the circumstance of having the first law-officer of the crown duly sworn by one of the king's judges.'

By those who wish to gain a general idea of the history of Ireland, Mr. Taylor's volumes may be read with considerable advantage. All occurrences are put in a clear and strong light, and past events are brought vividly before the reader. To the sketchy History of Ireland published by the late Mr. John O'Driscol, Mr. Taylor is much indebted for his account of the contest between James and William; and he has, in many passages, adopted the identical words and phrases of Mr. O'Driscol, to the injury of his own style. The account of Sir Teague O'Regan, which we have quoted, is indeed, if our memory does not fail us, very nearly a transcript from O'Driscol. Now, we do not quarrel with the historian for careful compilation; but why should Mr. Taylor copy O'Driscol instead of the original picture by Dean Story, which, to our mind, is far more graphic and vigorous, from its quaint style? Notwithstanding our criticisms, however, we are right well pleased with Mr. Taylor's performance, and so "with heartie commendacons" we bid him farewell.

Geological Sketches and Glimpses of the Ancient Earth. By Maria Hack. London, 1831. Harvey and Darton.

NEXT to astronomy, the study of the formation of the earth leads to the sublimest conceptions of Omniscience; and of all the sciences of observation, geology is that which gives the most comprehensive and enlightened ideas of the operations of nature, and repays the toil of labour with the richest fruits. The history of civilisation is soon lost in the obscurity of allegory or tradition, but that of the earth can almost be pursued to the period when it issued from chaos; and nothing but the highest intellectual enjoyment can result from even a partial acquaintance with the order, in the midst of confusion, with which the different parts of this great fabric were piled together, and the gradual manner in which continents were separated from land - when flowers and trees first adorned the primeval solitude-when strange forms wandered in the air, and animals more gigantic than any thing of the present day, roamed in sole possession of the first soil. There was a period when the air was probably not fit even for the existence of the smallest plant; and it was vegetation which alone effected that change in the character of the atmosphere which prepared it for the presence of the most simple organised beings, subsequently for creations of a larger size, and finally for man himself. The depths of the sea, compared with the elevation of the loftiest mountains, or the general height of continents, bear an exact relation to one another; and the continental masses of the present day are the depositions of former waters, or have been the basins of ancient seas, the fragments of the present earth. Mountains and mountain-chains have arisen on the surface of the earth, and have given a different elevation and slope to continents, and a different aspect to the surface of the earth; draining it of its waters in one part, or creating a new sea in another. The period of the elevation of these chains has been marked, like the rings of a tree, by the number of beds elevated on their acclivities; and every chain of the same age traverses the globe in a similar direction. The last great deluges caused by the upraising of the mountain chains, carried huge rocky mas into the valleys, or strewed them over the plains below; the larger animals were buried in the gravel, or carried by streams into subterranean caverns; and the age of the megatherium and the mammoth was followed by the period when man began to travel over and fertilise the earth - endowed with foresight and reason, he subjected the brute creation to his own purposes. his tribes multiplied; and the arts and sciences, though with them war, pestilence, and desolation, followed in his train.

Such are a few of the general facts which an instructive and noble science has made us acquainted with; and we really do not know why such important results should not be made known to young people, as well as to the more aged and literary; nor why Maria Hack should not deserve the thanks of the community for having made so extremely popular what has hitherto been too much wrapt up in details, or obscured by the technical language of the schools.

This little work is very prettily got up: the vignette pleases us even in a scientific point of view; for the opposition of the polypodium of the ancient coal-beds, with the nautilus of the mountain limestone; the echinus of the chalk, and the cerithie of the tertiary basins, forces the mind to contemplate successive eras in the formation of the earth, as much as Druid circles, amphitheatres, and pyramids, remind us of the former history of its inhabitants. We blame the authoress for diffusiveness; she appears always frightened of wearying her young readers. The philosophy of the science it is prudent to avoid, on account of the great probability of error when the knowledge of the subject is not very extensive; but the numerous and beautiful facts which adorn every part of this science, could not have been too much dwelt upon. We had read the letter from the principal of the Belfast academy to Dr. Drummond, quoted in the appendix; and most heartily do we wish that the study of the natural sciences should be introduced more largely into the present confined system of education. And we would remind those who make presents, that the immediate pleasure afforded by giving a young friend a pretty tale to read, is very different from the gratitude which always remains within us towards the person who first turned our attention to a branch of study, from which we may in afterlife reap, not only intellectual benefit, but consolation in adversity. Selfishness alone would dictate-instruct, if you wish to please.

which prepared it for the presence of the most simple organised beings, subsequently for creations of a larger size, and finally for man himself. The depths of the sea, compared with the elevation of the loftiest mountains, or the general height of continents, bear an exact relation to one another; and the continental masses of the present day are the depositions of former waters, or have been the basins of ancient seas, as those of the actual ocean is filling up with riod when this work appeared was singularly unfavourable for its due estimation; it was the hour of political frenzy, when nothing but reform filled the heads of men. We at once saw the uselessness of any attempt to divert the tide of public attention from its course, and accordingly reserved the continuance of our remarks for a more propitious time. This would seem to have now arrived; the tragic slaughter of Torijos and his associates is yet fresh and exciting; but however the result may be mourned, it must, to the few acquainted with the real state of opinion in Spain, cause no surprise.

The Peninsula seems ever destined to be the classic ground of Quixotism: happy for her present, more conducive to her future welfare, would it have been, had the freaks of her political errants been as harmless, as amusing, as his the ever-renowned of La Mancha. The cause of rational liberty has manifestly retrograded in Spain, and one of the chief causes has been the intermeddling of foreigners; and to this country, we regret to say, a large portion of the reproach is due. Actuated by a spirit of wild and inconsiderate philanthropy, a class of individuals have sedulously set to work to remodel the political institutions of other nations, according the proposed changes more in harmony with preconceived theories, than with regard to the actual wants of the parties most concerned. It is to the means which these mistaken but well-intentioned persons have afforded to a host of adventurers, that the progress of liberal principles has been for a time so decidedly checked in Spain. Every paltry irruption from the coast or the frontier has naturally been the signal for renewed proscriptions, and the imposition of closer restraints: the vexations arising from these ill-judged enterprises were alone sufficient to engender that feeling of hostility against more eminent leaders, which is now by all parties openly avowed to men who have no loftier object than the substitution of one tyranny for another. Let our countrymen be disabused, and no longer further such injurious, useless, and, as in the assassination of the governor of Cadiz, criminal attempts; let them wait for the certain but matured progress of principle, announced to them by men of such sterling mould as an Alava or a Llasamarillas; then let them, as an Alava or a massamanness, such as a such as glo-if they will, join hand and heart in such a glo-rious work of regeneration. The causes which must keep Spain for yet a long period in her apathy are sufficiently obvious. The wants of apathy are sufficiently obvious. her population are few and easily supplied; the clergy enjoy the doubly powerful combination of churchmen and landowners, and are the overseers (and liberal ones) of the poorer classes; the great deficiency of internal communication, and the little union between the principal towns; - these, with many others, into which our brief space will not permit us to enter, are clearly developed throughout Mr. Inglis' work. The increasing wretchedness of Spain is on every person's tongue; yet the real truth is, that though for a long time stationary, while her neighbours were advancing in wealth and importance, she has of late made some advances to a better state.* In Biscay, Arragon, and Navarre, agriculture has greatly improved, the export of wheat by her northern outlets from Gijon to St. Sebastian has risen to importance: in Catalonia and elsewhere, numerous manufactures of silk, coarse and fine woollens, cottons,

The soldiery, particularly the royal guard, are more regularly paid, and better equipped; and wherever these ameliorations have reached, the troops are to be depended upon.

established; in the Biscays the fabrication of arms and iron ware, though contending against a scarcity of wood for fuel, have not relaxed in activity; in the towns most distinguished for their industry, and in many of the sea-ports, a very marked increase of population has taken place since the census in 1821. We heartily wish this favourable report were capable of further extension, but the intolerance and imbecility of the government, the heavy burdens inflicted on the people, and their universal ignorance, compel us to this brief enumeration; and render Spain, with all her vast internal resources, "poor indeed."*
We have been so greatly pleased with the vivid and interesting picture which Mr. Inglis has given us of the royal family and court at Madrid, that we are induced to quote it, especially as it is also politically important, as giving a picture of the men in power.

"There is perhaps no European court about which so little is known as the court of Madrid, nor any European sovereign whose character and habits are so little familiar to us as those of Ferdinand VII. The first time I saw the king was on the day of my arrival in Madrid: he was expected to return from St. Ildefonso, and I mixed with the crowd in the palace-yard about an hour before he appeared. There were several thousand persons present, of all ranks, and his majesty was received with respect, but with no audible demonstrations of welcome. Upon this occasion I was not sufficiently near to observe the countenance and demeanour of the king. The next time I saw his majesty was on the Prado, the Sunday following, when he appeared in his state equipage, followed by the equipages of the two Infantas. The display was regal: his majesty's carriage was worthy of a more powerful monarch; it was drawn by eight handsome horses, elegantly caparisoned, and was followed by the two carriages of Don Carlos and Don Francis, and by that of the Princess of Portugal, each drawn by six horses; and the cavalcade was attended by a numerous party of huzzars. There were no other persons than their majesties in the royal carriage. The king was dressed in military uniform, and his royal consort wore a pink French crape hat, and printed muslin gown. When the royal cavalcade passed, the king was received with the usual silent tokens of respect; but when the carriage of the infante Don Carlos appeared, I could distinguish a few vivas. The king took scarcely any notice of the obeisances of his subjects; but the queen seemed anxious to conciliate their favour by many sweet smiles and affable bendings of the head. As for Don Carlos, none of the vivas were lost upon him: he had a bow and a grim smile for every one. It is said, and I believe with truth, that the king does not like this public competition with his brother for popular favour; but it has long been the invariable custom for all the branches of the royal family of Spain to attend prayers every Sunday evening in the royal chapel in the convent of San Geronimo, and afterwards to drive along the Prado. A few days afterwards I met the king and queen in the Retiro, on foot; they had been viewing the menagerie, and were returning to their carriage. Ferdinand VII. king of Spain, is like a lusty country gentleman, not the meagre figure he appears in Madame Tassaud's exhibition; he is large, almost to the extent of corpulency; his counte-any kind. The queen is a remarkably pleasing, and, indeed, a remarkably pretty woman; and the charm of affability, which is universally granted to her by those who have had the honour to approach her person, shines conspicuously in her countenance: she looks like twenty-eight years of age, but I believe she is some years younger. The king took little notice of the people who stood by, and who acknowledged the royal presence; but the queen bestowed upon them her usual smiles and curtesies. She was then an object of much interest with the public, for she was expected shortly to give birth to an heir to the Spanish throne; and to this event most thinking persons looked forward, as one that must produce an important influence upon the future condition of Spain. His majesty stepped into the carriage first, leaving the queen to the gallantry of an old general, who was their only attendant. Perhaps this is Spanish court etiquette: but that I may not be the means of fixing upon his majesty the character of an ungallant monarch, I must relate a circumstance that will certainly make amends for this seemingly ungracious act. I happened to be walking one day in the Calle de Alcala, when the royal carriage drove up to the door of the Cabinet of Natural History, and being close by, I stopped to see the king and queen. The king stepped from the carriage first; he then lifted from the carriage a very large poodle dog, and then the queen followed, whom, contrary no doubt to royal etiquette, his majesty did not hand, but lifted, and placed on the pavement; and then turning to the crowd who surrounded the carriage, he said to them ' Pesa menos el matriomoni,' which means, Matrimony is a lighter burden than the dog a very tolerable jeu d'esprit to have come from Ferdinand VII. It is a general belief in England, that the King of Spain seldom trusts himself out of his palace; at all events not without a formidable guard: but this idea is quite erroneous; no monarch in Europe is oftener seen without guards than the King of Spain. could give numerous instances of this, which have fallen under my own observation; but I shall content myself with one. A few days before leaving Madrid, while walking in the Retiro about six in the evening, in one of the most private walks, I observed a lusty gentleman, in blue coat and drab trousers, with one companion, about twenty paces in advance; and, as my pace was rather quicker than theirs, I caught a side look of the lusty gentleman's face: it was the king, accompanied by a new valet, who had just succeeded Meris, who died a week or two before of apoplexy. I had frequently seen the king without guards, but never before at so great a distance from attendants, or in so retired a place; and that I might be quite certain that this was indeed the redoubtable Ferdinand, I followed in place of passing. He walked the whole length of the Retiro, parts of which are more than a mile from any guard or gate; the garden is open to every body; some of the walks are extremely secluded; so that he was the whole of the time entirely in the power of any individual who might have harboured a design against him; and all this struck me the more forcibly, since, upon that very day, it had been announced for the first time in the Gaceta de Madrid, that the refugees had passed the frontier; and in the same paper the ordinance had appeared for closing the universities. The king walked like a man who had nothing to fear; and never pottery, hats, and paper, have been successfully nance is fat and heavy, but goodnatured, with once looked behind him, though his companion nothing of hauteur, still less of ferocity in it: occasionally did. Before making the circuit of it betrays, in fact, a total want of character of the Retiro, he reached the frequented walks, which were then crowded, and where he was of course recognised, and received as usual. exposure of himself seemed to me extraordinary, and scarcely to be accounted for: the best of kings have occasionally suffered by their temerity; and surely Ferdinand can have no right to suppose himself without an enemy: his conduct shewed either a very good, or a very hardened conscience. But, in truth, the king has not many enemies; many despise him, but few would injure him. I have heard men of all partiesthe warmest Carlists, the most decided liberals, speak of him without reserve; and all speak of him as a man whose greatest fault is want of character—as a man not naturally bad—good tempered-and who might do better were he better advised. An honest advisor, a lover of his monarch, and a lover of his country, Ferdinand has never had the good fortune to possess; but, counselled always by men who desire only to enrich themselves, and to maintain their power, he is constantly led to commit acts both of injustice and despotism, which have earned for him the character of tyrant. A despicable king might often make a respectable private gentleman. That capital failing in the character of an absolute king which may be called want of character-leading him to listen to every tale that is told—is the fruitful source of injustice in every department of the Spanish government. And the same fault that in a king leads to the advancement of knaves and the neglect of deserving men-to robbery of the nation and the ill-serving of the statewould, in a private sphere, only lead to the dismissal of a footman or the change of a fruiterer. I am acquainted with a colonel in the Spanish service who, after serving his country fifteen years, and receiving seventeen wounds, was rewarded with the government of an important fortress; two months after being appointed to this employment he lost it; and a distant connexion of the mistress of one of the ministers was put in his place. demanded and obtained an audience of the king, shewed his wounds, and asked what crime he had committed: the king said he must inquire of Salmon, who had told something to his disadvantage; and this was all the satisfaction he ever obtained. This man, a brave officer and a loyal subject, was converted into a disaffected person; and yet even he, although then leagued with the Carlists, spoke of the king as a man who would act better if he were better advised: 'Leave him,' said he, the name of king; let him perceive no difference in the externals of royalty, leave him his secretaries and valets, give him his segar, and let him have his wife's apartments at hand; and he would consent to any change that might be proposed to him by an honest and able minister.' A bad education has produced its worst effects upon a naturally irresolute and rather weak mind. Ferdinand was badly brought up by his mother; at an early age he was shamefully kidnapped by Napoleon, and long kept a prisoner, where he could learn nothing of the art of good government. He afterwards fell into the hands of a bigot, his late wife; and constantly assured by those around him of the precariousness of his throne, with the liberals on one side, and the apostolicals on the other, he has felt the impossibility of acting for himself, and has confided all to those who have undertaken to keep the state vessel afloat."

Paris, ou le Livre des Cent-ct-un. Tomes 1. II. L'advocat, Paris; Dulau and Co. London. 1832

Turs is one of those undertakings which do honour to all the parties concerned. If the liberality and spirit with which L'advocat conducted his literary enterprises have not met with success, they have at least met with gratitude. The two first battalions of the hundred and one authors who have marched forward to his assistance are now before us. must confess we think higher of the will than we do of the deed: there are some amusing sketches of Parisian life, but the majority are rather declamatory and very heavy: we look in vain for the brilliant wit once so characteristic of the French essayists, and think its place ill supplied by elaborate affectation of deep feeling and profound thought. The Cabriolet-Driver, by Alexander Dumas, is the very best, and, both for pathos and effect, a very beautifully told story; though we think the denouement will take most English readers by surprise. One of the pleasantest sketches is that by Mad. D'Abrantes, of her fellow-residents and visitors at l'Abbaye aux Bois, a celebrated French convent: among the prettiest of her portraits is Madlle. Delphine Gay, now Mde. Emile de Giradin. Une Fête aux Environs de Paris, by Paul de Kock, is amusing but coarse. As a whole, the work does not give us a very high idea of the present tone of French literature. Grossness, exaggeration, and a vein of vulgar scoffing, contaminate while they characterise: their passion is sensuality, and their sentiment silliness. One great merit of these volumes is, that from their contents a very shrewd guess may be formed of the state of Parisian society, nous autres sceptiques and all. We cannot but take this opportunity of acknowledging the promptness with which the library of Messrs. Dulau is supplied with the new French works; we could wish to point public attention to this, as we fear our neighbours know much more of our literature than we do of theirs. This work should have been noticed before; but our columns have been so crowded with new works, that foreign novelties have per force stood over.

This volume is devoted to " La grande Semaine" - the revolution of July 1830; and is illustrated by engravings of the tumults, &c. of that sanguinary struggle. For a history of political events so near the period in which it is written, it seems to be carefully compiled and well put together.

Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopædia, No. XXVI. Useful Arts: Porcelain and Glass Manufacture. London, 1832. Longman and Co.; Taylor.

THE processes by which many of the useful arts are carried to the perfection in which we see them, are sufficiently interesting and instructive to merit detail and preservation in volumes like the present; but few of them are more curious and entertaining than the art of making porcelain and glass. Articles ever before us, and constantly employed in so many ways, from the most striking experiments of science to the most common conveniences of provements, their completion, their various properties, their histories, clearly related. We are aware of the difficulty of conveying accurate ideas of these matters, without actually witnessing their manufacture; but the author has done all that could be done for his subject, and thus produced a very satisfactory work.

Principles of Geology, &c. By Charles Lyell, Esq. F.R.S., Professor of Geology to the King's College, London. Vol. II. London, 1831. Murray.

WE have received the second, though not the concluding, volume of Professor Lyell's Principles of Geology, and it appears, from a hasty glance, to be, like the former one, a monument of scientific industry. It is entirely devoted to the continuation of a subject which the author certainly illustrates with great felicity, — the formations which are actually going on upon the surface of the earth; and this leads him to treat widely of the distribution of the organic world, and of the influence of organic life in these formations. We defer until next number giving our opinion upon the subject: in the mean time we have said enough to recommend it to general perusal.

ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

J. E. BICHENO, Esq. in the chair. Mr. Vigors there was a balance in favour of the Society, on the receipts of December, to the extent of 5621.: during that month nearly 4,000 persons visited the Society's gardens and museum. Most of the animals which belonged to the crown, in the Tower collection, presented by the King, had been removed to the Society's menagerie; the duplicates and animals not required by the Society were presented to the Dublin Zoological Society; an act which gives great satisfaction to the members of the English Institution. In reference to the motion of Mr. Sergeant Andrews, -that a certain sum be set apart for the building of a suitable museum, -the chairman stated, that the learned sergeant's object was already fully answered, the council setting apart five per cent upon the Society's receipts for the erection of a museum. The learned sergeant not having attended to prefer his motion, it was understood that he considered it as superseded by the pre-existing powers vested in the council. A considerable number of candidates were elected into the Society, and auditors chosen.

Donations were received from the Royal Astronomical Society, Mr. Lyell, M. De la Beche, Mr. Majendie, Mr. Goodhall, Mrs. Phillips, Mr. J. Taylor, jun., Mr. Murchison, and M. Alex. Brongniart.

IMPROVEMENT IN CANDLES.

WE were this last Saturday brilliantly enabled, especially under the circumstances of the case, to see the old year out and the new one in - thanks to the present of a certain number of candles, made upon an improved principle, and submitted to us for a trial of their superior abundance of the floating supply to the wick, life, are here investigated and explained; and qualities. But though we have begun this could not be moved about without much danto break off in the midst of this extract: our | their materials, their preparation, their im- | notice facetiously, we must seriously perform our agreeable task of reporting most favourably upon this great and manifest improvement in the manufacture of an article of so much consequence to domestic economy. We are given to understand that the philosophical as well as practical individual whose experiments have led him to secure this discovery by patent, has long been engaged in endeavouring to form candles in such a manner, and of such a composition as would free them from inconveniences familiar to us all, and cause them to burn brightly and equally without waste or And he has at length succeeded; trouble. but we ought, previous to stating how, perhaps, preface our remarks with a brief history of candle-making.

It has been (we are assured) a great desideratum in the manufacture of wax candles to find out some method of moulding them, as is practised in the manufacture of spermaceti and tallow candles; but hitherto all attempts have failed. In the former, suspended from a hook, is the wick, along which the operator pours some melted wax: he performs the same process on other wicks; and by the time the wax is sufficiently cooled he takes them by half dozens, and laying them parallel to each other on a slab, he with a flat board rolls them about till they assume a cylindrical appearance. They are then again placed on the hooks, and the process repeated till the candles attain the size required, when they are rolled for the last read the usual reports, which shewed that time, and the maker cuts them even at the lower end. His next work is to measure them with a rule, and, with a board levelled at one edge, to round them at the point, so as to give them the tip at which they are to be lighted. It will readily be seen that this method is not only tedious, but so irregular that the most expert maker cannot produce two candles exactly alike; and farther, that in consequence of the numerous concentric layers of which they are composed, they can neither be so handsome, so transparent, nor so solid, as candles from a

> Another obvious desideratum in making candles was to be able so to construct them as that the external part might consist of an ingredient, wax or composition, requiring a higher temperature to melt it, than the material forming the innermost part or body of the candle. This being effected, a very admirable and economical candle would be produced, combining the great advantages of an exterior pleasing to the eye, of durability, and the essential property of never running over or guttering. And in this the patentee of these improved candles declares he has succeeded: which, from the proofs afforded us, we are of opinion he has. In fact, we marked and tried his specimens against other candles purchased in the best shops in town, and were perfectly satisfied of the superiority of the former. These specimens were either entirely of wax, moulded, or of another kind coated with a composition. The latter consist of a wax exterior, enclosing as it were an inner part of some stearin and spermaceti in about equal proportions, and the outward wall requiring some fifty degrees of greater heat to melt it simultaneously.

> We fairly tried both as we have stated, and the result was, that while the wax were infinitely more solid, symmetrical, and lasting, than the purchased candles of the same size made in the old way by rolling, their composition rivals burnt as steadily and well. It seemed to us, however, that the latter, particularly from the ger of a spermaceti sprinkling, still worse than the usual liberal allowance from wax lights in transitu. The wax were beautiful; and from the diminution of manual labour in making. are, we believe, considerably cheaper.

We had no means of ascertaining the different intensity of the light; but as far as could be judged by the eye, the new had little to fear from competition with the old.

It has always been a gratification to the Literary Gazette to make every useful invention known to the public; and it is not lessened on this occasion, when we have to speak of an improvement by which we hope to see to write a great deal better for many years to come. These candles have not yet been produced for sale.

LITERARY AND LEARNED.

LIFE OF JACK MITFORD !!! THE PERIODICAL PRESS!!!

WE were last week tempted by something of an esprit du corps (though, certes, without feeling much admiration for the fraternity,) to extend our customary New Year's Address, by a few remarks on the degraded state of a considerable portion of the periodical press, and a few words of advice to its presiding priests and their associates. We therein generally indicated the sort of persons who have set themselves forward as oracles of the public; and, if we may judge from sundry anonymous letters we have since received, our cap has been one of extraordinary and capacious fitness. One worthy gentleman, residing, as appears from the date of his epistle, in Hanover-square, but who has taken the trouble to send his valet (perhaps?) all the way to Fleet Street to pop his letter into the more congenial twopenny post-office of that refined quarter, for Wellington Street, which he must have passed on his way, advises us to publish the names of the offenders, and kindly supplies us with five for that purpose. Now, though this is signed Amicus, we heg to decline the proposal: we point our reprobation at a system, and we are not inclined to be the executioners of individual delinquents, however much they provoke exposure and punishment, and however useful to the world of letters that infliction might be. Other very kind friends give us equally judicious advice; but we are rather too old in the Editor's chair, and have been too successful upon our own good old plan, to adopt their well-meant suggestions! We would only hint, that the naughty little boys who wish so much for a whipping in the Literary Gasette cannot have their aspirations for making a noise in their day and generation gratified through that means. It has cost us fifteen years of toil and struggle to reach our station, and spread our influence to the most remote parts; and it seems unreasonable that every little imitator should expect to accomplish as much during its ephemeral career. It is enough for us to see them rise and fall, boast and burst; without interfering to hasten the inevitable explosion, or aggravate the coming darkness of utter extinction. When they are gone, we remember them with a sigh, most Christianly forgiving their abuse of us their great prototype and parent, (for that abuse is an ingredient which has belonged invariably to them all); and we mournfully exclaim, ye Registers, ye Chronicles, ye Journals, ye Sphynxes, ye Beacons, ye et-ceteras, sleep in peace, if conscious of aught, consoled by this, that from your ashes will spring successors worthy of you, and in them live for a while your wonted fires.

But we are allowing ourselves to be diverted from the main object of this paper; which was to invite attention to a remarkable illustration of the opinions offered in our last, touching the probable amazement of the enlightened readers of periodicals, if they were made aware of the personal rank, weight, and intelligence of the I's so often couched under the omnipotent We's, who direct their judgment, and teach them to thread the pure paths of truth, and the broad highways of independence. This accidental enforcement of our view is to be found in the Morning Heralds of Monday, and is entitled

"Death of Jack Mitford;" the particulars of which event are related with the particulars of which event are related with the usual partiality of biography, as follow:—

"Last week, in St. Giles's workhouse, expired the notorious Jack Mitford, perhaps the most eccentric character of his day. He was originally in the navy, and fought under Hood and Nelson; he was born at Mitford Castle, Northumberland, and the authoress of Riemsi, and the author of the History of Greece, were his cousins; he was also nearly related to Lord Redesdale. His name will long be remembered in connexion with Lady Percival, in the Blackhesth affair, for his share in which he was tried, but acquitted. For many years Mitford has lived by chance, and slept three nights in the week in the open air, when his finances did not admit of his paying three-pence for a den in St. Giles's. Though formerly a nautical fop, for the last fourteen years he was ragged and loathsome: he never thought but of the necessities of the moment. Having had a handsome pair of Wellington boots given to him, he sold them for one shilling. The follow who bought them went and put them in pawn for 15s., and came back in triumph with the money. 'Ah,' said Jack,' but you went out in the cold for it.' He was the author of Johnny Newcome in the Novy, the publisher of which gave him a shilling a-day until he finished it. Incredible as it may appear, he lived the whole of this time in Bayswater fields, making a bed at night of grass and netties; two-pennyworth of bread and cheese and an onlon were his daily food; the rest of the shilling hexpended in gin. He thus passed forty-three days, washing his shirt and stockings himself in a pond, when he required clean linen. He formerly edited the Soourge and Bon Ton Magazine. He was latterly employed by publishers of a certain description. A hundred efforts have been made to reclaim him, but without avail. A Mr. Eliott, a printer and publisher, took him into his house, and endeavoured to render him 'decent.' For a few days he was sober; and a relative having sent him some clothes, he made a respectable app the usual partiality of biography, as follow :-

Such is the biography of Jack Mitford; compared with many of his contemporary writers in the periodical press, a rather favourable type of the caste. He had a respectable education, was well connected, had seen a good deal of life, and it was only during the last fourteen years of his being that he took to gin and literature, vagabondising and contributing, nettle-beds and editing together. During this period it seems he was the editor of several journals and magazines; and from his lair dictated to the public taste in literature, the arts. and sciences, and even in fashion - Bon Ton! We knew something of Jack, for he once wrote a paper in the Literary Gazette, A.D. 1827, No. 531. It was a memoir of, as he said, his near relative William Mitford, the Greek historian; and though his MS. was suspiciously redolent of the pot-house and tobacco, we were induced to pay its price and insert it. The consequence is to be seen in our No. 533, where a statement from the true representative of the deceased author contradicts nearly every fact of our veracious informant; and a note of our own dismisses the case. Not so the writer: he had got his footing and his guinea or two (jollity for three nights!), and many an effort did he afterwards make to obtain admission to our columns. And we notice this merely to afford a sample of the system : we, of course, were not to be hoaxed by the same hand again; but it has often amused us to read in some of our most braggard imitators, the papers we had returned to our correspondent Mr. Mitford; and there is hardly a week that passes in which we have not similar instances of pretension and folly blazoned upon articles we have rejected for partiality or falsehood. This in some mea-sure accounts for the virulence with which we are so continually assailed: the " Pariahs of the Press," as the author of the Tauroboliad * so aptly designates them, naturally make common cause with those who acknowledge them, and war, to the knife, on those by whom they are rejected. Else, whence the gin and the tobacco, the cheese, the onions, and the beer, of these wretched creatures? Oh, what pity it is, that the profligacy joined to their destitution should render them unfit objects for charity, and prevent them from obtaining a livelihood by honest means!

In laying bare these deformities, we are the last to impugn the honourable efforts of the press: we would only rescue the slightest portion of its influence from "Blackguard"+ hands. The press is too powerful to admit of its force being safely wielded by the unprincipled and unworthy; and every sentence with which they poison the public mind is a stain upon the whole, tends to throw doubt on those who do their duty conscientiously, and to impair the beneficial effect of the free and honourable exercise of a trust vitally important to society in every ramification, and to the dearest interests of the country at large.

We could, and probably we will, pursue this exposition; but as much of our examples and reasoning must of necessity be drawn from our own experience, and therefore assume somewhat of the appearance of self-praise, we shall for this week conclude, wishing readers in general guides more to be depended upon than the late Jack Mitford, and not a few of his surviving

ROYAL SOCIETY OF LITEBATURE.

JANUARY 4. - A memoir was read, on the unknown characters engraved on the rocks at Gebel el Mokattib, in the vicinity of Mount Sinai; in a letter addressed to the Secretary by John Belfour, Esq.

These singular and mysterious records, though not hitherto published, have long been a subject of curiosity and conjecture. The best account published of their situation and general appearance is to be found in the journal of a certain " Prefetto of Egypt," from Cairo to Mount Sinai and back again, published in the year 1772, by Robert, late Bishop of Clogher. Accurate copies of many of them were brought home, on their return from the East, by Lord

The result of the are, Apollo and Daphne, Minerva combating a inquiry on this point shewed that these remark-warrior, Actson devoured by his dogs, Hercules able vestiges of antiquity are, as the Bishop of and Antiope, Jupiter and Semele. It is sin-Clogher conjectured, for the most part, in the gular, that the heads, the hands, and the feet primitive Hebrew character,—that which the of the female figures, in these sculptures, are Talmudists call Cuthean, or ancient Samaritan; of marble, while all the other parts of the work but blended with a mixture of the Chaldee, or are of stone. present Hebrew character, used by the Jews since the Babylonish captivity; with Greek, &c.

2. In his second subject of inquiry, viz. the nature and probable import of these ancient monuments, Mr. Belfour confined his remarks National Portrait Gallery of Illustrious and to the exposition of those characters which appear the most prominently and frequently.

Most of the inscriptions begin with a monogram composed of three letters, usually connected, answering to the Hebrew characters. This symbol, or abbreviatura, is uniformly followed by four other characters, decidedly Cuthean or ancient Samaritau, which correspond to the letters באראם. Regarding these characters as a kind of key to the whole, Mr. B. endeavoured to find an appropriate meaning by applying to them the several rules of interpretation adopted in the Jewish Cabbala. Reflecting, further, on the sanctity of the mountains Sinai and Horeb, together with the holy exordium peculiar to the Orientalists in their writings, he found that the abovementioned monogram (interpreted in conformity with the Cabbalistic rule, which consists, lst, in taking each particular letter of a word for an entire diction; 2dly, in forming one entire diction out of the initial of many,) may be with propriety interpreted ___,ארוני יהי מבארך Be the Lord blessed! or some similar sentence of adoration of the Supreme Being; and that the Samaritan letters which constantly accompany it, (taking again each particular letter for an entire diction,) may read שוב רחום אלהים Dr, The good, the merciful high God; or words correspondently expressive of the attributes of turn;" and which we believe to be as original the great Jehovah.

That this principle of interpretation is tenable, as applied to the inscriptions, was shewn by applying it in the analysis of several of them. It is, however, but of partial application; for even if proved just with regard to the majority of the characters, it still leaves a great variety of anomalies to be accounted for. As tending to the solution of these, it was observed, that the Hebrew and all its dialects, that is to say, the Samaritan, Syriac, Chaldee, Arabic, and perhaps the Phonician, may be regarded as the same language; as such, therefore, in ancient times, the letters of the various alphabets, formed from one primitive character, might have been promiscuously used; at least, some combinations of the sort might have been admitted by general agreement; and it is only upon this ground that the characters belonging to different languages, observable in the same inscription, are reconcilable to any philological rule. The demotic writing of the Egyptians offers an example strongly in favour of such an hypothesis.

A part of Mr. Belfour's memoir having been reserved for reading at the next meeting, we must here interrupt our report of its contents;

Prudhoe and Major Felix: these, so far as we upon resuming it, we shall present our readers

PINE ARTS. NEW PUBLICATIONS

Eminent Personages, particularly of the Nineteenth Century. By William Jerdan, Esq. Part XXXIII. Fisher, Son, and Co. SIR Thomas Plumer; the Right Hon. Warren Hastings; the Right Hon. Henry Dundas, Viscount Melville. "Our present number," observes the author, "comprises three distinguished individuals, whose public lives were linked together, and between two of whom exists a remarkable coincidence. Both Lord Melville and Warren Hastings were men of distinguished abilities; both placed in most responsible situations; both subjected to impeachment, which in each case was begun and conducted in much party spirit and bitterness: Mr. Plumer conducted the defence of both;

and both were favourably acquitted." The memoir of Sir Thomas Plumer presents a pleasing picture of the success of talent, industry, and worth; that of Mr. Warren Hastings a painful one of the unjust treatment of an eminent public servant. To the northern part of the empire the memoir of a man to whom Scotland is so much indebted as she is to the late Lord Melville, must be peculiarly interesting. The last mentioned contains, among other matters, the following "curious fact connected with the history of the times; one of those small facts on which great ones as it is curious.

"It had been proposed that the impeachment of Melville should be followed by that of Pitt; but when some members of the opposition went to Fox, they found him singularly lukewarm, and, indeed, he threw cold water on the whole proceeding, alleging the extremely vindictive appearance which would be incurred by such a proceeding. The wheel within the wheel was this: Fox's marriage with Mrs. Armitage had taken place under circumstances which had prevented her being much visited. The Duchess of Gordon, and one of her daughters, having obtained a knowledge of what was in agitation, forthwith visited Mrs. Fox, used every art of conciliation, drove with her in an open carriage, and invited her to the Duchess's house, where she was received with all possible attention. The bait took; and his wife's influence effectually modified the vehemence of the patriot.'

We cannot refrain from remarking, that Mr. Robinson, in his engraving from a portrait of Sir Thomas Plumer by Sir Thomas Lawrence, has excelled even his former excellence.

Anecdotes of William Hogarth. J. B. Nichols and Son.

Ir it were only that this little publication had given us the means of re-perusing Mr. Charles Lamb's admirable Essay on the Genius and Character of Hogarth, we should be grateful to it. It has been most justly observed: "Lamb has penetrated further [than Walpole] into the genius of Hogarth; he has analysed in the most masterly manner his powers of imagination and invention, and has brought to his subject a mind that completely grasped it. From him we learn that Hogarth was a truly philosophical artist, not a mere putter-together of figures to compose amusing pictures; for he has shewn that his works are replete with profound study and vigorous intellect, and that, for the quality of thought, they will bear a comparison with those of the greatest masters." The present part also contains a reprint of the able and elaborate Essay which was originally written for the large edition of the Genuine Works of Hogarth, after the plates had been repaired by Mr. Heath; and of critical remarks by Mr. Phillips, Mr. Payne Knight, Mr. Britton, and Mr. Allan Cunningham.

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

CLUB LAW.

To the Editor, &c.

SIR,-I was greatly surprised at reading in the Literary Gazette of Saturday, December 24, a new, but greatly deteriorated, version of a song which I wrote ten years ago, "on the exhibition of a mermaid at the west end of the town," and which song was partly suggested by an opinion given in the Literary Gazette in 1822, respecting the composition of that " frightful monster, which the world ne'er saw" till that year. The song in question was given to a professional gentleman, and sung by him, in 1822, at his annual concert.

How such a mutilated and spurious copy found its way into your journal, I am utterly at a loss to divine. However, somehow and somewhere, somebody must have heard it, and sometime since have written it, somewhat from memory, and somewhat from imagination, as some parts are tolerably faithful transcripts of the original, while others are "weak inventions."

My surprise at seeing this transformed and deformed offspring of my muse in the Literary Gazette, would have been great indeed, had you not stated that you insert some things on account of their goodness, and some on account of their badness. The latter reason sufficiently accounts for its admission; for if the original be comparatively good, the copy is positively bad; if the original be bad, the copy is worse, so much worse, that the copyist could not possibly make it (to use a vulgarism) worser.

Now, sir, you may, perhaps, in turn, be surprised that you should have had sent to you a spurious copy of a song which has been two years in print. But though it has been printed, it can scarcely be said to have been published, as only twenty copies were struck off, and those solely for the use of the subscribers. Here, sir, it may not be improper for me to inform you that I am a member of a small society, holding its meetings on Saturday evenings, for social converse, &c. To this society some of its members have occasionally sent literary trifles, as songs, epigrams, short essays, &c. some of which were thought worth preserving; and a subscription was entered into for printing twenty copies, at any convenient periods. In one of these numbers I was requested to allow my old song of the Mermaid to be printed, together with another song of the same punning, or if you please, puny character, which I had then recently written, and which of course is not known out of our little society. This number I have enclosed, that you may see how much injustice is done to the song and its author by the spurious copy inserted in your journal, and which has been copied into the London Spy.

Under these circumstances, it would be but justice to me, were you to insert the original. I am, &c. 22, Duke Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields. THOMAS TUCKER.

"The Mermaid.

I sing of a maiden of ancient renown,
Not long since much talked of in country and town;
She has—to surprise you I think it can't fail—
A great monkey's head and a large fish's tail.
As the tail's the fag end of a fish, said a wag,
The tail of a fish must make her a fish-fag;
All billing and cooing with one I should hate,
Who is fit for no billing except Billingsgate.

Tol de rol, &c.

To see this strange maiden was every one's wish, Although she was even a very odd fish; She's not much like Venus most people agree, Yet, like Venus of old, she arose from the sea. To other fair maids this sea-faring divinity, With plenty of fins, has but little affinity, For she'd wave a wine vaults to walts with a wave, Finding gay life where they'd find a watery grave.

Tol de rol, &c.

Of this very odd maiden they tell these odd tales, That ere she saw Britain she'd often seen whales; And though half seas over, she ne'er had a wish For drinking too much, yet she drinks like a fish. And what you will think a proof of her merits, This maiden could never endure to touch spirits; But though it is true that from spirits she'd flee, She has lain very oft with soles in the Red Sea. Tol de rol. &c.

Without a side-saddle she rode a sea-horse, But she could not, like maids of the east, sit across; But what seems more strange, and indeed quite romantic, Though she can't cross a horse she could cross the Atlantic-She has not one suitor can suit her, 'tis said, Yet this maid does not murmur, although a Mermaid; She no doubt weighs their merits, and finds that each fails, She can weigh them, because she has plenty of scales.

Tol de rol, &c.

They say she's a heiress, some great Triton's daughter, Without one foot of land, rich in oceans of water; And at her two guardians, because she can't rail, She turns up her nose—ay, and turns up her tail. One guardian, 'twas said, would away with her run—At her running some people would say 'that's all fun,' He surely did not mean to make her his bride— He surely did not mean to make her has been the Her flesh of his flesh, would be flesh fishified.

Tol de rol, &c.

Tother guardian applied to the Chancery Lord,
And he made this fish girl a Chancery ward;
But when to this state his Lordship had brought her,
She looked very much like a fish out of water.
Now since with this maiden they've done what they will,
Who knows but they'll send her to Brixton Tread-Mill;
The wonder would then be, I think, most complete,
To see this maid treading without legs or feet.

Tol de rol, &c."

Having, by the foregoing insertion, cleared our conscience of an offence unwittingly committed, we cannot part from our friend and correspondent Tom Tucker, whose very name is hilarious at this festive season, without availing ourselves of some more of the contents of his little book, which we may respect as a literary curiosity, there being but twenty copies printed. Tom Hood is decidedly a plagiaristthe following song was written by T. T. in February last!

There was a man, named Daniel Dabb,
(A hapless man was he,)
Who sometime lived at a sea-port, But it was not Portsea. He dealt in fish and mended shoes, But could not make it do, Although he sometimes sold a fish, And sometimes sold a shoe.

So of a quack he learned to bleed, And draw teeth with precision, And as he knew the heeling art, He set up as physiciam.

He took a cellar, which you know
Is always under ground,
And sometimes heel'd a pair of shoes,
And sometimes heal'd a wound.

By fish and shoes and drugs,' said he,
'I hope I shall rise higher, For by a cellar I can't live, Unless I have a buyer. On wealth I've staked my all and last, And trust that I shall win it, For if a tray of trades won't win, I think the deuce is in it.'

But people would not have teeth drawn, Because it gave them pain;
And bleeding, when folks will not bleed,
You know is all in rein.
One day, when at his cellar-head,
He sat with doleful face,
A servant maid came up to him,
And asked him for a plaice.

He'd herrings shotten, though not shot, That shone like any gem, And though he'd placed them all in rows, Roes had no place in them.
Says Sue, 'they are all skin and scales,
And full of bones within;' Says he, 'I've mussels without bones, And very little skin.'

And very little skin.

Says Sue, 'they're poison, though I own
That I for some with soy long;
And as for poison I've heard say,
The French call all fish poisson.
But I should like a little fish.'
Says Dan, 'I've no white-balt;
And as the cels are slippery things,
You'd better take a skate.'

Oh no! a plaice I want, says Sue: On no! a piance I want, says Sue: Says Dan, this is the case, Because I was not out in time, You see I'm out of plaice.'
Indeed, says Sue: 'why so am I, My mistress wants one stronger; And though she says I am too short, She does not want me longer.

' If that's the case, dear Sue,' says Dan, Why something must be done; So as we two are out of place, Why let us two make one. To mend folk's shoes, and serve them fish,
Some want of help I feels;
So while I drive nails in their toes,
Why you can skin your eets.'

'Oh, no,' says Sue, 'that will not do;
I'll find some other work; For since you are a mussel-m You'd use me like a Turk. So off she ran, and left poor Dan A disappointed elf;
And when he'd cried fish all that day,
At night he cried himself.

Next morn on a large nail he hung, And hung till he was pale;
For though death took him off the hooks
He could not off the nail.
And when they bore him to the grave,
Sue wrung her hands and cried;
And some one rung his knell, although
It was for Suchaesided. It was for Sue-he-sighed. Feb. 1830.

But the " Crack" do not deal in humorous productions alone: here is a piece of pretty pathos by E. B.

" Address, &c. With stealthy pace, another year
Of mingled joys and sighs—
Of heart-felt passions, silent woes,
And high-wrought ecstasées—
Hath done its doom: hath passed away
Into eternity;
And leaves to man a shadowy dream,
Softened by memory.

The world hath seen, this by-gone year, The efforts of the Mind Burst tyrant Superstition's chain, And disenthral mankind: Our sister Isle, unfettered thought At length is free to boast; And Freedom's Io Pæans sound Through Greece, from coast to coast.

Let other bards in loftier rhymes These themes of pride rehearse;
Be mine to sing of homelier joys,
In this, my humbler verse.
For we have joys of matchless worth,
To cheer our bosoms here,
Where friendly faces smiling meet,
An annual feast to share:—

The thought, that o'er our little band The thought, that o'er our little band of intellectual friends,
The tyrant Death hath had no power,
A glow of feeling sends:
The hope, that many a circling year
May view our meetings yet,
In unrestrained and social mirth
As we so long have met."

pith of the wood, as it were, of which the Club is formed.

" To the Chairman of the Crack.

-I hope Angelina will not find fault with the im-Sit,—I nobe Augelina with not find failt with the imperfectness of some of the following rhymes, as, though birds are said to have a particular disposition to pair on this day, I do not find it to be at all the case with words, and have had considerable difficulty in coupling them. I remain, yours truly,

*Feb. 14, 1830.

CLEMENTINA

A maiden, I a swain do lack;— May I seek him at the Crack?— All I wish is present there; Yet many do the virtues share Which I would in one combine Ere I choose a Valentine. Tucker's knowledge and good sense, Tucker's knowledge and good sense, Evans's true eloquence,
Brookes's wit and Begg's good-nature,
Just a spice of Ramsay's satire,
White's honest warmth that scorns concealing;
Tomlinson, thy kindly feeling;
These together must combine
Ere I choose a Valentine. Walker's frankness, Sweeting's mildness, Part of Brewster's sprightly wildness, Findlay's steady joviality, Marshall's love of regularity, Ireland's glow for virtue's sweetr Davis's good taste and neatness; When in one these all combine,

He shall be my Valentine." From this we gather, not only who are the leading characters of The Crack, but also that they are not like the selfish male asses of greater clubs, exclusive of the sweet so-ciety of females. On the contrary, ladies are admitted, and form a distinguished portion of The Crack. Which of the gentlemen whose names are embalmed in our last quotation beginning with great B. i. e. whether witty Brookes, goodnatured Begg, or sprightly Brewster, is the author of the Address, it is impossible for us to determine; leaving the interesting inquiry, therefore, to the ingenuity of our readers, or perhaps, if they are very anxious, they may satisfy their curiosity by applying to the eloquent Mr. Evans (the worthy "Boke" auctioneer of Pall Mall, we guess by the appellative), we now close our earliest, but we trust not our last acquaintance with The Crack, by one quotation more.

" Sonnet.
As when a spark mid rotten straw does fall, At first it smoulders unperceived, and then A few faint wreaths of smoke will issue whe The soft wind stirs the mass;-at length o'er all The soft wind stirs the mass;—at length o'er all Around the vapour hangs—a cloudy pall—Stinking and blackening, wanting power to blaze But strong to smother or obscure: the haze Distorting every object, great or small.
But soon the half-corrupted heap's consum'd,
The breezes fan the air, the ashes fly:
No mark is left of all that lately gloom'd,
Except the site remaining charr'd and dry.
So envy in vain bosoms smoulders—fumes—Blackens—distorts—itself then, impotent, consumes."

DRAMA.

UNREHEARSED STAGE EFFECTS.

Covent Garden .- Dec. 21. Power whose talent as an improvisatore is so well known, and who, if a piece once hit, may be almost said to re-write his own part, now seems to have infested the whole company with a like mania. In the last scene of the Irish Ambassador, on the evening of the above date, Miss Taylor, soon after the final entrance of Diddear, the Grand Duke, took occasion to address Power, emphatically, with the words, "Oh, infatuated individual!" and Ellen Tree, Abbot, and Bartley (as must have been concerted to puzzle our hero), each repeated in turn, after each other, the same words—"Oh, infatuated individual!" but in such an actor-like style, that the whole dramatis personæ, with the exception of Power, indulged in what Blackwood calls a "guffaw," at their own wit, or lack of it. But Power, who of course was not to be foiled with his We now enter the interior, and get into the own weapon, suddenly turned short round upon Diddear, and wound up with the following remarkably pointed impromptu: " And what is it your highness is giggling at, I'd like to know?-and I suppose it's that same young lady at your elbow (Ellen Tree) is slyly tickling ye! and you (to Bartley) stand giggling there as if you thought you had been saying something remarkably witty, and didn't know of it yourself." Of the last point of this sally I cannot attempt an explanation; but it must be a brilliant climax, as the audience laughed as they would, or should, at the best wit of the best dramatic humorists.

Olympic .- Dec. 26. First night of Olympic Devils. The whole scene of the bacchanalian orgies, ending with the tearing piece-meal of Orpheus, and the floating of his head down the Hebrus, was so beautifully managed as almost to amount to a charming illusion, from which, however, I was most roughly awakened by the following incident :- The floating of the bard's head was managed in the same manner as the swimming of the wolves in Mazeppa, at Astley's, appearing through an aperture in the supposed water, which is gradually drawn across the stage. On the occasion alluded to, the water was pulled along in so irregular a manner as to excite not only confusion, but alarm among the actors and the audience; and amid cries of, "Take care! Here! There! Faster! Slower! Tighter! Looser! Pull! Leave go!" &c. &c. a voice exclaimed, "Damn it! you'll strangle her!" Where now was the illusion? What! methought, is Orpheus then a woman? Could that dissevered head be strangled if there remained not yet a body to it? - and who are the bungling river deities, so careful, so profane!

Covent Garden. - Dec. 28. I was surprised on entering the theatre, to find the curtain slit up the middle to the height of six or seven feet, and pieced behind with green baize, strongly contrasting with the alternate horizontals of light brown and dark white (an ensemble long called, par complaisance, green) of the original. The too original! What was my astonishment - mixed, I must confess, with mirth-to observe, when the curtain rose, foldng itself in the usual manner, that this novel appendage was detached, except at its upper end; so that it necessarily, as the curtain rose, remained dangling at the bottom of it, and continued in sight when the curtain had vanished, presenting a most original and absurd appearance. In like manner, at the close of the play, this ill-looking clout was the herald or advent of the curtain, and preceded it till the bottom of the curtain touched the stage. I could not conceive what was intended by this most remarkable contrivance till its fourth appearance at the end of the pantomime, - when, lo, it proved that the slit was for the accommodation of Herr Cline's rope-dancing machinery, which extends even into the orchestra! Surely this most unusual dissight will not continue to amuse, annoy, or puzzle the public, at the commencement and close of every tragedy and comedy during the run of the pantomime, for so trivial a cause; for who, of the few that remain, sees or cares how the curtain falls at the end of a pantomime?

Mr. Ellar, after having been pulling the strings out of his dress from the moment of the fairy's appearance till that when she bid him change, at last, after presenting for some time a heterogeneous ensemble of legs and arms, rushed off the stage in the character of Harlequin, with the character of Prince Llynot and single and kicking at his heels! I do not relate this occurrence because it is unusual,

8: Native, not any. Bombay, — European, latter the character of latt, 1820, 4; 1830, 12: Native, 1814, not any; 1820, 2; 1830, 4. Bengal, — European, creatinate too long. We have a very kindly feeling towards all the offerings of our Transatlantic literary brethren; but we cannot say much in praise of the Pleasures of Friendship, a volume of poems recently received from Philadelphia; though we observe that it has reached a "fifth American edition."

but because it is strange that it should occur to so practised a mime.

Adelphi. - Dec. 29. The Wreck Ashore. The East Gate in Regent's Park" suddenly descended in Chatham marshes, instead of the wonted dreary landscape! As this scene pertained to the pantomime, it was, I suppose, perfectly in character for it to be anon rapidly withdrawn, and discover the more appropriate one, even though the change was effected in the midst of the pirate's glee. The audience were, however, exceeding wroth, as well at the unusual sight of a scene changing when the stage was covered with characters, as at the long delay which preceded the fall of "the East Gate," ruining, as it did, the effect of Mrs. Yates and Mrs. Fitzwilliams' acting, after having shot Grampus through the door. To fill up the pause, both ladies changed the atti-tude in which they had fainted.

VARIETIES.

Saynètes. - A word lately introduced into the French language, intended to describe dramatic compositions which are incapable of being performed.

Vulgarity. - A member of the Chamber of Deputies lately declared from the tribune, that if facilities were afforded for rendering Paris an entrepôt of commerce, the capital of France would become a vulgar town, like London, or Amsterdam!

The Melodists' Club, we perceive by their secretary's announcement, recommence their harmonious meetings this month. Lords Bristol, Devonshire, Charleville, Saltown, and Garvagh, appear as vice-presidents, to support H. R. H. the Duke of Sussex as president; while the musical phalanx boasts of Braham, Sinclair, De Begnis, Curioni, Bedford, Stansbury, Blewett, Beilamy, Terrail, Leeti, Hawes, Horn, Parry, Torri, and other eminent vo-calists, as well as distinguished composers and amateurs. The number is limited to a hundred; and we hear that both the dinners and the afters are vastly pleasant.

Fossil Forest discovered near Rome .- In the Edinburgh New Philosophical Journal for this month, conducted by Professor Jameson, there is a notice of an interesting discovery which METEOROLOGICAL JOURNAL. 1832. has been made by a pedestrian tourist (Dr. Weatherhead, we believe), namely, that of a fossil under-ground forest, above forty feet in thickness, and extending for several miles along the banks of the Tiber, close to Rome. The petrific matter is a calc-sinter; and, from the layers of ligneous débris being freely intermixed with volcanic dust, the discoverer of this interesting circumstance thinks there can be little doubt but that this colossal phenomenon was occasioned by an earthquake, of which the memory is lost - probably long prior to the foundation of Rome. It is singular that so curious a fact should have escaped observation for so many ages.

Press in India.—A parliamentary paper has been published, containing the number of the periodical publications and printing presses under the license or sanction of the British government at the several presidencies :- Bengal: European publications in 1814, 1; 1820, 5; and 1830, 31: Native publications in 1814, not any; 1820, not any; 1830, 8. Fort St. George,—Europeau, 1814, 5; 1820, 8; 1830, 8: Native, not any. Bombay, — European, 1814, 4; 1820, 4; 1830, 12: Native, 1814, not any; 1820, 2; 1830, 4. Bengal, — Eu ropean, 1830, 2: Native, not any. Bombay, European, 1630, 6; Native, 2.—Times. It is a curious fact to add, that though we believe there is not out of London a daily newspaper, even in the most populous of our cities, no fewer than five are published every day in Calcutta .- Ed. L. G.

The Gigantic Book .- We translate the following paragraph from Le Globe, of the 19th ult. "The largest book that ever went to press will appear next year in London. It will be entitled, 'The Pantheon of English Heroes.' Every page will be twenty-four feet high, by twelve broad; and the letters will be half a foot long. It has been necessary to construct a machine expressly for the fabrication of the paper. This gigantic work will be printed by means of a steam-engine; and instead of black ink, gold varnish will be used. Only a hundred copies will be struck off; intended as the ornaments of the principal English libraries!!!"

The extraordinary suppressed book on the Political Intrigues of the French Princes, is under consideration. It is too dangerous ground to be trodden without.

We ought to apologise to Mr. Lowndes for not much earlier doing justice to his useful Bibliographer's Manual, which richly merits compliments, encouragement, and every assistance from literary men. Books published in Nos. are apt to distract us a little, in the midst of incessant employment; and we are sorry to confess, that sometimes the very intrinsic worth of publications causes them to suffer from neglect. We need time to examine them thoroughly; and that we may be correct, we procrastinate too long.

THE NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

At the recommencement of the publishing season, we scire the opportunity presented of addressing our readers. In this momentous and critical period, it is well for all men appearing before the public, either in literature or in politics, to be fully under-memous and critical period, it is well for all men appearing before the public, either in literature or in politics, to be fully understood by their tribunal.

Every man who writes without prejudice and without fear, is at this moment possessed of some portion of that magnificent powers—the power of influencing public opinion; and never was there a moment when he who holds such power ought to pause more cautiously before he exertist—to strike more boildy when the decision is made. Whatever have been their battle—with the period the press have done their duty. With the people has been their battle—with the people that been their battle—with the people that been their battle—with the people that the people that the people that the people that the contract of the people that period which lies before us. We have engaged new allies, provided ourselves with new resources, and spared no exertions that may render the advocate worthy of the cause—which is that of peace, order, and the people:

In general politics, it is our design to bring before the public whatever seems to require reform, or to need protection. This is a time when, if no expense, no exertion, he spared to secure contributors of equal sminence and equal ability, the political part of a Monthly ought to rise into greater important, and is now forgotten.

But politics do not make the principal, though they may make the guiding portion of this Journal. Perham of direct and grave away; or sometimes to dilate over what was important, and is now forgotien.

But politics do not make the principal, though they may make the guiding portion of this Journal. Perhaps of direct and grave politics, less will be given than hitherto; and as the season advances, or as public affairs subside into a calmer channel, we will increase our attention to the politer letters.

Things that occur daily, the common records of the month, in times like the present have an ulterior and deep interest, which the light observer does not readily perceive; and to selze and select these—the straws that betray the wind—we shall redouble our vigilance and care: hoping, perhaps, to breathe into them, and into the general spirit of our Periodical, a more steady and that as yet been the more complete singleness of design, than it has as yet been the more complete singleness of design, than it has as yet been the more complete about one greet our readers at the onset of a new campaign.

Steel Points and White Metal for the body of the Case, substituted for Silver, are frauds on the Public. To avoid these impositions, see that the Pencil has the name, "Mordan and Co. Makers and Patentees," on the body of the Case, and that the Case is all Silver or all Gold. To insure the genuine Camberland Lead, and that of a proper size to fit the Pencil, (first observe whether you have been supplied with the genuine Patent Pencil, which attention to the above remarks the Pencil, it is to the proper size to fit the Pencil, (first observe whether you have been supplied with the genuine Patent Pencil with attention to the above remarks fencil which attention to the above remark deviated "Warranted" on it, and a cot acaling wax impression, bearing the initials S. M. and Co. The Public pay as much for the spurious Steel-pointed Pencils as for the genuine Silver and Gold articles. Shopkeepers in provincial Towns would do well to observe the above remarks, to prevent their being imposed upon, as daily complaints have been made by many persons to the Manufactory, 32, Castle Street, Finsbury, London, in consequence of the above impositions. It is obvious that the reason the spurious stricles are pressed upon the shopkeepers' attention is, their yielding a greater profit to the persons supplying them; this profit arises from the deterioration of the article, which its, of course, injurious to the retailers; and the public are also much inconvenienced in not being supplied with the genuine patent article. TO DETECT FRAUD.—Pencils having Steel Points and White Metal for the body of the Case.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

An Essay upon National Character; being an Inquiry into some of the principal Causes which contribute to form and modify the Characters of Nations in the state of Civilisation. By the late Richard Chenevix, Esq. F.R.S. L. and E., M.R.I.A. 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1832. J. Duncan.

" By the late Richard Chenevix." What a noble legacy for a man to leave behind him! In these volumes are garnered the labours of a life-a life of profound investigation, and of immense knowledge, digested by a singularly clear and contemplative mind. It is a work put forth, too, in the noblest spirit of litera-ture,—that which looks to the future, and builds up, not a palace for self to dwell in, but a noble and enduring monument for the instruction of ages yet to come. In April 1830, we had the painful duty of recording Mr. Chenevix's death, and we then mentioned his reputation for many and high acquirements, though we were not at that time aware of this important production, the result of long la-bour and unwearying industry. There is to us something at once touching and elevating in the retrospect. Humanity has some individuals whereof it may be proud. Here is a man devoting his chief existence—not to anght that can be repaid by the passing vanities and interests of the hour-but to collecting and arranging a mighty mass of thought, whose merits will be appreciated, and whose benefit will be felt, when he himself is cold in the grave. Chenevix is, indeed, the finest example of his own doctrine, where he represents the selfestimation founded on the consciousness of honourable and arduous exertion, as the greatest and best principle in human nature. know we cannot do justice to these pages; but have not the power of discussing the various opinions propounded, or stating at length why we feel convinced of the truth of most of them; but we can enrich our columns by a series of striking remarks and profound observations. We shall proceed to our collection.

General character more easy to be drawn than individual .- " If a wider view be taken, if the painter be placed before an extensive landscape, his task becomes different. In the great mass of verdure which he beholds, the variety of minuter shades is not distinguishable. red, blue, white, and yellow flowers, however lively their tints may be, when seen alone and near, are all confounded in the mingled prospect, and the result is one universal green Of this nature is the appreciation of national character. It is the universal green, if the expression may be allowed, resulting from the union and mixture of the characteristic hues of every individual, which must be looked for, and accidental variations must be rejected. * * * The pursuits and passions of an individual

The publication of which was briefly announced in a preceding Literary Gazette.

Whatever does not affect the bulk of society, though it may act strongly upon individuals, cannot be considered as contributing to national character. Conquest, commerce, liberty, whatever has been among the pursuits of empires, are objects around which the wishes of mankind unite. Against these, opposition is principally levelled by the jealousy and power of other nations, whose intercourse is remote, and whose influence is slow. But a single being, surrounded by his fellow-creatures, with each of whom he stands in multiplied relations, must be acted upon by causes more numerous. though more minute, than can affect a community. An obstacle to the study of individual character, which may be neglected in observing the character of a nation, is dissimulation. Should an individual pursue a system of concealment, the true temper of his mind may long remain unknown; but it is impossible that such a combination should be entered into by a nation as can hide its real disposition; and it would be more easy for a ferocious people to become humanised, than to assume the garb of humanity."

Observance of foreign countries "There is not a single branch of science which does not require some labour and attention; there is not even a mechanical art to which some apprenticeship is not necessary. No naturalist would visit the Alps, with a view to examine the structure of the globe, unless he had devoted some time and study to every object which could mature his judgment, and give validity to his opinions. Yet persons who have passed their lives with books, who have seen human nature in print, or who have not seen it at all. go to distant nations, and describe, as universal truths, what they perceive there, under impressions arising from inexperience and astonishment. The usual feeling upon first visiting a foreign country is surprise, the natural attendant upon novelty; and the sentiment is shared not only by the vulgar, but by the enlightened. It is accompanied by pain or pleasure, as the objects seen are in discord or in harmony with the disposition of the observer; but in either case it is generally exaggerated. Every day diminishes the impression; till, at length, the customs which astonished inexperience are looked upon with as little wonder as those which were left at home. But no condition of mind is more hostile to calm observation than a state of emotion, which magnifies and disfigures truth. On the other hand, again, when habit, which has the power of destroying sensibility to peculiar customs, has diminished the perception of things worthy of attention, much which, when new, excited tonishment, no longer attracts observation."

Perfectibility .- " To bring the minds of men to the same level, to bestow on them all an equal delicacy of perception, or the same accuracy of judgment, would be as chimerical as the wild projects of universal monarchy, or universal fraternity. The storm of passion cannot are more complicated than those of a nation. | ness of opposing parties cannot be sweetened by any dictates of philosophy. While power is gratifying, while wealth procures enjoyment, while men are ambitious, nations will seek supremacy, and armies will contend. No hope of endless perfectibility, then, is here indulged; neither is it denied that events will continue in future ages, as in past times, to revolve within a certain, though a widening orbit, where empires will shine for a period, to set in glory or in shame. Yet surely by stating the principles upon which men and nations interpret expressions apparently synonymous, and appreciate ideas that seem capable but of one single value, some prejudices may be diminished, and some animosities allayed. Did not the endless diversity of human disposition make language as various and capricious as itself, or could greater precision be used in estimating human character, some healing assimilation might be hoped for among the jarring opinions of our fellowcreatures. But the nature of man does not admit of absolute modes; and his best destiny in this world seems an indefinite approximation to perfections which he never can attain."

Mr. Chenevix refers the varying character of nations to where they are actuated by pride or by vanity. His analysis of these two qualities is admirable, both for depth and clearness: we must content ourselves with one or two detached parts.

Pride.—" Among the sources of pride arising from intellectual exertion, are abstruse researches, deep contemplation, the acquirement of those branches of knowledge which cannot be attained without protracted study and perseverance. The lighter occupations of fancy more frequently create vanity. Yet a philosopher may be so much applauded as to yield to the seductions of vanity, and a poet may have laboured so intensely as to become proud of his muse. Pedantry is the pride, not the vanity of learning, were it for no other reason but that it usually belongs to minds which acquire with difficulty.

Vanity...." Ostentation, in its strict sense, is vanity; yet the thing of which a display is made, may in itself be a motive of pride, as has already been remarked of virtue; nay, pride itself may be a motive of vanity, as in the case of a man who, having acted with becoming pride, proclaims to the world that he has done so; or, in other words, a man may be vain of his pride; but no man ever was proud of his vanity. We do not fear to let the world know how highly we value the awards of conscience; but we are ashamed to own, even to ourselves, that, having once attained the approbation of so competent a judge, we can stoop to court an inferior authority."

Contrast between the two..... Pride may be compared to the sun, which ripens the plant in silence; vanity to the breeze, which spreads its fragrance through the world.

He traces the effects of pride as generated by successful struggles with natural difficulties, elevating and invigorating the character of a be allayed by an magic of words; the bitter- (nation; and of vanity, as generated by a luxuand draws this inference :-

Where there are no difficul- of correction and reform, may generally be ties, there is no stimulus to exertion; where allowed to be the most moral." difficulties are insuperable, there is no hope of success. But a due ratio between the impediments opposed to national progress, and the means of removing them_between natural obstacles and the human faculties, constitutes the maximum of human advantages. It is neither just nor accurate to suppose, that the best prodigality of nature is shewn in gifts which are palpable to sight. There is a richer and a dearer beauty, perceptible only to the mind, in her very parsimony; for if she sometimes allows to nations a prosperity attained by greater labour, she makes that prosperity more noble and more secure."

Luxury the consequence of vanity, as civilisation is that of pride.—" A proper distinction between civilisation and luxury is all that is necessary to refute the doctrines which maintain that man is happier and better in the savage than in the improved state; doctrines which indeed cannot be admitted with any modification whatever. Even luxury makes him better than he was; and though it may not correct all the vices, or give him all the virtues of which he is capable, still it softens and refines his nature, and spreads embellishments over all his being. It makes a lovely statue of the block, gives grace to the limbs and polish to the surface; and though a soul may still be wanting, there is yet much to admire in so wonderful an image of life. The soul can be bestowed by civilisation only. Civilisation is feeling, understanding, virtue. It is all that the heart and the mind can give to the union of men in society, and the summary of all that is good in social improvement, religious and political, moral and intellectual. It is one of the most legitimate sources of pride which men can have; for it is the best condition which they can achieve, and the work of their most valuable faculties."

The failure of Zieka, one of the earliest reformers .- " His failure, and the failure of the Hussites, shew the danger which attends the premature introduction of any principles, however good and wise, into a nation unprepared to receive, and incapable of appreciating them; neither can the knowledge, the liberality, and the efforts of a few supply the deficiency. The misfortune of Ziska was, that he too far out-stripped the genius of his age; while Hannibal and Casar only obeyed the temper of their respective times. The greatest man must surpass his contemporaries but by a little, and the boldest truths must be proportioned to the comprehensions of those to whom they are addressed. If they are not so, they are of no more advantage to the world than a beacon raised above

Religious toleration in America...." The progress of this country, compared to that of the Romans, teaches how the most opposite wants may equally tend to produce national prosperity. The want of territory for their population made the Romans brave; the want of population for their territory made the Americans tolerant."

Public opinion " is a very just measure of national morality; orimes are the acts between the classes which stand the nearest of individuals—opinion is the feeling of the in interest and rank; between the nobles and nation. Where this is strongly and justly pro-the people, to oppose the power of the king; venerable and imposing appearance; they look nounced, it may fairly be concluded that the that is to say, between every class of the go-like Aaron assisted by the Levites. There judgments deserve entire confidence. From ing. From this resulted liberty." "One important truth is the consequence of the admission of this principle, a singular conwhat precedes: the most advantageous situa- clusion may be drawn: the nation which raises

Very just remark.

"It has been a practice of every age to lament its own degeneracy, and to exalt the virtues of its forefathers. So general, indeed, has the custom been in all times, that one age after age, however, had spoken the truth; if every succeeding generation had been worse more, and less of fiddling and dancing. than the former, in what part of our beings would room have been found to contain the many centuries ?"

As we now advance, we should observe, that Chenevix makes pride the great national feature of the English, from having had greater difficulties to encounter; while vanity is that of the French. The contrast between the cruelties practised by each nation is as striking as truth founded on historical fact can make it; we need scarcely add, that the balance is much in our favour.

Differing oreeds .- "The Mahometan creed human institution ever has effected. By mixing together things sacred and profane, and prohibiting change, it has shut the door against all advancement. The nations that have adopted it have condemned themselves to remain stationary amid a progressive world; and to be thus stationary is to be retrograde. despotism of Persia is certainly not less now than it was two thousand years ago. The tyranny of Hindostan is the same. Asia Minor has suffered as much from the oppression of Tartar princes and Mahometans of every kind, as from the worst of her native sovereigns. China has not advanced, and the innumerable dynastics which she reckons have not given her liberty. Such is the melancholy picture of every part of Asia; and mankind is condemned to perpetual infancy in the regions of perpetual pleasure."

The British constitution. — "Though the British constitution may not be perfect, yet so well balanced a system of rights and duties cannot be found in history. Natural difficulties uniting every man, and every class of men, no selfish interests interfered to make it but a partial blessing; or, if such feelings ever did exist, they were the enlarged, the enlightened feelings of social and of national interests. To wrest the charters from Henry, from John, from Edward; to expel the despicable James, every class united; and none obtained a privilege which it did not share with the others. In France, where common necessities were less, every man was labouring for himself; every class was struggling to pull down all above, or to trample on all beneath it; and nobles, clergy, lawyers, universities, third estates, vied not so much to become great, as to prevent others from being more prosperous than themselves. There the most preposterous union was formed; one from which no result can be expected but despotism - the union of the sovereign with the people, to crush the nobility. In England the combination was rious climate, making those struggles needless; sentiment of virtue is powerful, and that its verned to curb the encroachments of the govern-

Visit to the Courts of Sweden and Russia. By Captain C. Colville Frankland, &c. 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1832. Colburn and Bentley. RESERVING our opinions of this publication till next week, we shall for the present only observe, that the author mixed much with the elite of society at Petersburgh, and gives us many details of the fashionable frivolities of would be inclined to suppose it to belong to the Russian capital. Of the " Russ army" we are told:

"It is very difficult to get a correct estimate stock of depravity which, long ere this, must of the Russian armies; some reckon them at have been collected by the accumulation of so 1,000,000, others at 800,000. The latter is the most probable; but even this number is, I believe, above the mark. The Russian regiments are seldom complete, a great many men existing upon paper only. When a Russ army is in campaign, it receives four times the amount of the pay mentioned on the foregoing sheet; that is to say, it is paid in silver. As far as I have hitherto seen of the Russian troops, I must say, that they are the most orderly, most cleanly, most soldier-like, and best-looking of all the armies I have ever beheld. Of the line has done more to perpetuate slavery than any I know nothing, for of them I have seen but very few in Finland. The Chevalier Garde and the Garde à Cheval, the horse artillery, hussars, and lancers, are superb troops, as well, if not better mounted than any cavalry in Europe. In the Russian regiments a terrible system of abuse exists, namely, the plundering of the economy chest by the colonel-in-chief and other superior officers. This chest is filled by means of savings made out of the appointments, rations, forage, &c. of the different corps; for instance, the government issues every two years two complete suits of uniform for the soldiers, the colonel makes one suit last two years, and arranges with the fournisseur for the second suit, in lieu of which he receives a sum of money. The same thing is done in cavalry regiments by the chiefs of squadrons, with the corn and straw, &c. for the horses, as well as for the uniforms. The money thus raised is supposed to be placed in the economy chest, for the general use of the regiment; but it is under the control of the colonels and chiefs of squadrons, who help themselves; by these means they drive four borses to their carriages, keep good tables, and drink champagne; but they rob the poor soldier of his hardly-earned dues. How much better it would be for the government, which is perfectly well informed upon this topic, to increase the pay of the officers and soldiers, and retrench the superfluity of uniforms and forage. Such a system must de-moralise the officers of the army, and disgust the soldiery with their chiefs."

We will next copy a notice of a religious ceremony among the Jews.

"Oct. 5-17 went with the Codringtons to hear the singing at the imperial chapel. It is the most sublime thing possible: such is the ensemble and perfect melody of the voices, that one imagines one's-self transported into heaven. Some of the bass voices were astonishing, and sounded like the prolonged vibration of the great string of a double-bass. The flowing heads of hair, the long beards, and fine vest-ments of the priesthood, give them a most was, however, one part of the ceremony which struck me as ludicrous, namely, the bringing in of the leavened bread upon a board, covered up with a white cloth, borne upon the head of one of the officiating priests. It seemed so like a baker and his loaves! He was, moreover, a most ungainly-looking priest, squinting fatally with one eye, which circumstance deprived his countenance of dignity and reverence. The priest who read the service had terribly dirty boots on, and looked as if he had come from a pig-sty."

The following affords a favourable idea of the feelings of the higher orders of Russians towards England.

"Wherever I go (says Capt. F.) among the Russian noblesse, I find the greatest desire on their part to shew me how much they value the good opinion of my country, and how much they strive to equal us in their progress towards perfection in the arts and sciences. They mostly speak English, and love English customs and literature, and admire our national character, although they do not seem to copy it."

Respecting the general manners and traits of society we extract a few particulars.

" I have often been struck by the want of sociability which exists between the youth of both sexes in the societies of Petersburgh. I have frequently asked the reason, both from ladies and gentlemen, of this éloignement. The ladies and gentlemen, of this congression. And ladies naturally reply, 'We cannot make the advances to the gentlemen, and they will not make them to us. Were it not for you strangers, we should never exchange a word with the male sex.' Again, they say, 'The gentlemen are ungallant and illiterate; their conversation consists in nothing, even if you chance to elicit it. They spend their time in the bureaux of the different establishments, or else on guard —what can they know? What can they say to amuse a gentlewoman?' The men justify themselves in a somewhat similar manner: they accuse the women of too great a partiality for foreigners, with whom, they say, they can-not compete with any chance of success. They say the ladies are absolute negations, and have not a word of conversation beyond the French play and the last ball. But I think I have discovered another motive for this extraordinary distance ; it is, that there are too many grosses épaulettes (or, as we should say, big wigs), in society, who, as they always wear their uniforms, keep the young men too much in awe. No man has any grade in society in Russia other than his military (or corresponding civil) rank. A subaltern, or captain, dares not put himself very forward in society, for fear of incurring a rebuke, and a severe one too, from his superior; and of this I have lately heard a remarkable instance, in the person of a young officer of good family, but of low military grade, who was warned by his superior that he was too intimate with a certain beautiful lady, and that he had better take heed and not thrust himself too far out of his sphere, lest the consequences might be painful to him. Conceive the spirit of Martinettism and of the camp being carried into the heart of civilised society, and into the privacy of our tenderest passions and most intimate and dear enjoy-ments!"

Ct. 27. (Nov. 8.)—Sunshine and mild. Promenade in the Newsky Perspective with Tiesenhausen. We met their imperial majesties of all the Russias on foot. The emperor has a disagreeable way of staring a stranger out of countenance."

Our countryman, however, in other parts was, however, one part of the ceremony which paints Nicholas in the most glowing colours as a pattern to monarchs. " His imperial majesty is a remarkably fine looking man, of upwards of six feet in height. His countenance is open and ingenuous, his manner frank, but a little inclining to brusque. If I were to see such a man in a crowd, I should say, 'That man is born to be an emperor.' He is thirty-six years of age, and is represented by all those who have access to his person, and who are well acquainted with his character, to be the model of a prince and of a man. His fine physiognomy is expressive of benignity, magnanimity, and intelligence. He received us in private audience, and as we stood in a sort of semicircle, he went round and addressed something kind and pertinent to our professions and nation, to each of us. He asked me if I had ever seen in India any thing of the cholera: to which I replied, that I had never served in India, but that I had had the complaint commonly called cholers morbus twice in my life, once at Buenos Ayres in South America, and once at Constantinople. His majesty seemed surprised, and asked me how I was treated for it; to which I replied, the first time, simply with barley-water made very sweet, and the second time with syrup of oriest and water. I remarked, likewise, that the Arabs, who were well acquainted with the cholera, treated it with rice-water and sugar.

'Ah!' said his imperial majesty, 'you have not then had the oriental cholera, but its first cousin; but,' said he, 'your remedy is deserving of notice.' He observed, that he trusted that the measures he had caused to be taken, of quarantine and cordon sanitaire, would check the progress of the disorder: but, he added, it is very difficult in Russia to make the people pay obedience to sanitary regulations. 'You in England,' said he, 'respect and obey the law, and enforce quarantine rigorously.' I replied, that I hoped the excellent example set by himself, in performing fourteen days of quarantine, on his return from Moscow, would be productive of good effects. Turning to Capt. N.—m, of the Grenadier Guards, he asked him how long he had been in Petersburgh, and whom he came with. N—— replied he had arrived with Sir E. Codrington. Oh, said the emperor, 'I am sorry I did not know that, for I should have had much pleasure in shewing you all that I shewed him.' He said something kind to the two other gentlemen who were presented with us, and then told us that the empress would be glad to make our acquaintance; said that he hoped to see us often at court, and that we should make a long stay in Petersburgh: 'But, of all things,' added he, 'go to Moscow; for there you will see the true Russian character, and the old Russian capital.' He then bowed, and wished us good morning. We were next ushered, by the Count Modène, into the empress's apartments, and had not waited long before her imperial majesty appeared, attended by Count Litta, the grand chamberlain, and Mademoiselle la Comtesse Sophie de Modène, the lady in waiting. Her majesty is tall, fair, and beautiful. She was very gracious, and said that she recommended me to go from Moscow to Odessa, and so on to Constantinople by sea; but when I told her majesty that I had already been at Constantinople, she replied, 'That the English were such great travellers, that it was not easy to point out any new route to them.' We had the honour of kissing her majesty's hand; and at the expiration of a quarter of an hour, she withdrew, and so finished our pre-sentation at cour;"

The following is a singular and characteristic

"Cavley told me a curious anecdote respecting a Baron Sutherland, a capitalist. As it will serve to shew how little confidence can be placed in the imperial finance system. I relate it as nearly as I can recollect its import. Baron Sutherland (père), a capitalist, had been long in the habit of advancing money and faisant des affaires with the court and the government. Suddenly came a war with France, and times of difficulty. The baron received no dividends: reclamations were vain: the answer always was, 'Wait a little longer.' In the mean time Sutherland died, and left the affairs unsettled. The son claimed payment: the minister said. 'There is some mistake in the accounts; send us a fresh estimate of the debt and interest.' It amounted to several millions. 'Oh!' said the minister, 'this is too large a sum to be paid to any individual; we cannot think of doing so.' 'Pay me what you please,' said Baron Sutherland (fils). The minister paid him nothing - not a sous. The baron died a beggar, living upon the charity of the English merchants. For some time previous to his decease, he would not move out of the house of Cayley, which had given him an asylum. 'It is not fit,' said he, 'that I should be seen in a country which has made a beggar of a man who ought to be one of the richest and most powerful of the land."

We give, and conclude with, another odd anecdote.

"Count Ostermann was more remarkable for his love of bears than of the fine arts. It is related of him, that when he gave a great dinner, he used to cause to be placed behind the chairs of his guests a bear, which, thrusting his shaggy head over the shoulder of the convice, would growl out his supplications for food, and extend his pawless stumps (for he was mutilated, to prevent mischief) towards the table. How strange that a man, who ought to have passed his days in the caverns of the Orsine [ursine?] species, should have built and lived in a palace of marble and gold! This is, indeed, barbarous magnificence."

The Opera. By the Author of "Mothers and Daughters." 3 vols. 12mo. London, 1832. Colburn and Bentley.

THE story in these volumes is of a more romantic and passionate tone than has usually coloured what are termed fashionable novels. We hold the mysteries and dénouement of fiction to be as sacred as the statue of Isis-we never lift up the veil that covers them; and shall therefore content ourselves with informing our readers that the Opera is, as it were, a German story of the most gloomy excitement, told with all the lively satire and dramatic realities of an amusing and modern novel. Mothers and Daughters was more entertaining, and the Opera is more interesting. The tale we will leave with all the attraction of curiosity; but from its animated sketches and keen remarks we shall make a collection.

"We used to say at Göttingen that every Englishman is born with a mania for legislation. Let him have but a single idea in his head, and it is sure to be connected in some way or other with 'the British constitution.' The hereditary worshippers of liberty are in point of fact so enamoured of despotism, that, not content with the laws of God and man framed for their subjugation, they have constituted half-a-dozen minor codes of the most fanciful and arbitrary nature; and as if these enactments of the common council of society each individual institutes for himself an extraordinary statute of limitations. In Paris. people usually conform to the little prejudices and customs of the coterie to which they belong; and in determining a point too trivial to be submitted to the mighty test of 'right or wrong?' refer it to the preference of those with whom they live in habits of intimacy. But this never appears the case in my own country. An Englishman observes on every petty occasion, 'I make it a rule,'—'it is my invariable custom,'-- 'nothing should induce me to,' &c. He lives up to a theory in the choice of his greatcoat; and acts upon fixed principles in the colour of his coach-horses; regulates his servants' hall on the system of Say; and will not pass a bill without three readings and a family committee. Even his egotism assumes a parliamentary tone.

" It is so much the custom on the continent to talk with horror of the table excesses of England, that I own I was surprised by the tone of Brabazon's entertainment. There was something refined, even to effeminacy, in all the arrangements of his house and establishment; and the mere dinner might have been eaten without contamination in a boudoir of the Chaussée d'Antin. With respect to wine, a few glasses of sherry and claret, with one of champagne, formed the utmost limit of any man present. I will answer for it, that neither Vienna, Berlin, nor Paris, could exhibit a more moderate assemblage of bachelor guests at the table of a bachelor host. Eating, rather than drinking, appears the present mania among Englishmen of distinction; and the vice of gluttony must soon be introduced into the commination instead of that of drunkenness. Gluttony, however, is not the word for the thing; we are sadly in want of a noun definitive of the more than Epicurean daintiness of modern fashion."

Young Ladies.—" They talk, and so does the automaton at Weeks's Museum; but as to lively and conversible, I never heard either of them utter an opinion which might not have fallen from the lips of every other silly, smiling, chatting, common-place woman, from the days of Mesdames Shem, Ham, and Japhet, till now. Lady Clara and Lady Sophia are in fact well-dressed, well-mannered girls, without a notion upon earth beyond that of passing a pleasant season. Every thing with them is comprehended in that one word 'season.' If any member of the family be ill, they hope he, or she, or it, will 'get well before the season.' If any public catastrophe occur-a famine, an epidemic, or a Reform Bill, -their first inquiry is, ' how it will affect the season;' and nothing would induce either of them to marry or die, or perform any other remarkable evolution, so as to interfere with the pleasures of the season. 'Wait till the end of the season,' will be their reply, whether to the erl-king or to the earl-suitor. Ever since Christmas they have been making eager inquiries of all their friends, whether it is expected to be an early season or a late season -a good season or a bad season; and since we have been standing here, I have heard Lady Clara remark to seven young men and three young ladies, that thank Heaven! papa was obliged to come up for the House of Lords, and they are settled in town for the season.' That is what you call lively and conversible; and what I call having no heart, and very little head."

exclusive. What folly will come next? A Week in a Country-house .- " In London no man forms more than a single brick in the vast edifice of society; he even loses all sense of his own identity in the overwhelming importance of the mass; and while he sees others amused, moves onward with them in the general progress, and fancies he is amused himself. It is difficult to preserve the selfish consciousness of one's individual vexations while surrounded by myriads of happy faces, and amid the incessant stir and tumult of the world. But in a small circle such as this, people are driven to their own resources, thrown upon their own responsibilities, and compelled to make their own acquaintance. Total solitude might perhaps afford a lesson more permanently useful; but the melancholy seclusion which limits them for a time to the intercourse of some twenty or thirty individuals, all dependent upon others for amusement, is not without influence. No crowd, no theatres, no orchestras, no variety, nothing current in the way of gossip but the coinage of their own brains; -nothing attainable in the way of an exercise of human ingenuity, except from their own exertions. The dull are taught to discover their own dulness—the unaccomplished their insipidity; till terrified lest the fact should become apparent to others as well as themselves, they do their utmost in their own defence, and renounce for a time the indulgence of their in-dolent egotism and trivial vanity. The Ladies Charleville who, in Arlington Street, think only of diverting themselves, labour at Romford Park, or Donningwell Castle, for the entertainment of others; and act, dress, dance, sing, ride, as much for our amusement as their own Brabazon too, whose reputation as a wit is sufficiently established to enable him in town to eat his dinners in silence, feels himself in some degree responsible here for the flatness of the dialogue, and exerts himself to talk as well as listen for our gratification. I suppose it is the weariness of such efforts, and in many instances their total failure, which imparts so rare a charm to the plebeian lions, and professional beaux esprits one occasionally meets in the best circles. A man who can contrive to secure my lord (his host) from the necessity of being witty and entertaining; or a family of young ladies, whose petits talens can be put forward as a screen for the deficiencies of her ladyship's (their hostess) patrician offspring, are of inestimable value during the ordeal of the holydays. To some such cause, too, I am willing to attribute the Epicurism of the higher classes. The enjoyments of the table form a point of union dear to the selfishness of every guest; -- producing no envy, requiring no disinterested exertions, beguiling the tedium of a life of unmixed prosperity, and susceptible of the excitement of endless variety. The mansions of the great cannot be provided with a more popular artist than a good cook; for his ministry becomes available at least three times in the twenty-four hours, without rendering him a burden during the intervening period. musician or the wit must be amused in his reciprocation. He addresses his talents solely to the sensual and selfish gratifications of others;

We are sometimes compelled to inquire, What shall we do with Rebus this evening? the Duke of Dorchester dines here, and you know how he hates a pun; or, ' How shall we contrive to keep the Minims quiet? Lady Dunny is coming down, and she abhors music. But Monsieur Casserole and his three courses are sure of sympathy in every breast."

Mothers and Daughters was one of the very popular novels of last season; but we think its successor evinces superior talent, and of a different kind.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. A Sermon preached in pursuance of the King's Letter, in the Parish Church, Northfleet, Kent, on Sunday, Nov. 27, 1831, in aid of the Funds of the above Institution: with a brief Memoir of the Society, By the Rev. George Croly, LL.D. London, 1831. Duncan.

 $\mathbf{W}_{\mathbf{E}}$ have seldom space to notice single sermons; but having in this No. of the Gazette, in the spirit of impartial journalism (whose object it is to supply every kind of information on sub-jects embraced within the plan of publication), quoted a heavy charge against parties engaged in the conversion to Christianity of barbarous races of men, we think we cannot do better than furnish an antidote from the eloquent address of Dr. Croly. This sermon (advocating the cause of an enlightened and enlightening Institution), gives an abstract of the progress of Christianity from the first ages of the missions-adverts to the British reformation-states the origin of the Society, as having been called for by the religious necessities of our early colonists in America, for whom it provided churches and ministers; its founding the episcopal church, which now consists of seven hundred clergy; its adopting the missions to the East, where the British church is at last established; and the extensive prospects of good which it still continues to open and cultivate.

The British Martyrdoms.—" Among us, too, religion had her sufferings. The gold was refined in the hottest furnace of persecution. Blood was shed, of which the world was not worthy; the hoary head and the young heart were not spared; the ashes of the noble and the obscure were mingled in the same pile. But the promise of the Lord was still unchangeable. The reformation spread; its first check had only invigorated its progress; even the severities of the law only pressed the cause closer to the pub-lic heart. The graves of the martyrs were less tombs than trophies; less warnings to the national fears than hallowed memorials and calls to share the imperishable honours that even the humblest might obtain in the service of religion. From that hour the victory was gained. The Scriptures were diffused beyond the reach of suppression in all after-time; the truth rose from the very flame in which it seemed to be consumed; and leaving behind it all that belonged to decay, burst upwards with a renewed youth and an uncontrollable wing."

The Rites of the Church of England .- " With what formidable results must be followed the long intermission of baptism, that great regenerating rite, which brings our stained and helpless human nature into the family of the turn; but Monsieur le chef requires no such just! - of confirmation, that takes the noble responsibility of the faith upon ourselves, and pledges our ripening intellect and heart to the and the art of cookery necessarily assumes a hope of immortality!—of the communion, that pre-eminence over all other fine arts, in the at once 'convinces us of sin,' and satisfies us of brilliant retirement of the villa and the coun- the atonement won by the most merciful and try seat. The Infidel.—" To those who disdain the belief of Christianity, these statements are not addressed. Let them wrap themselves in the frigid consolations of infidelity; let them believe, against all belief, that there is neither a hereafter nor a God; let them struggle, if they will, against the resistless impression, that we are for some higher fate than the beasts that perish; or achieve the bitter and calamitous success of shutting up their hearts against the cries of spirits soliciting to be led into the way of immortality. But we have not so learned Christ. It is our highest consolation to believe, that man is not left to his own helplessness even here; that the soul is not a vapour of the passions; that there is something firmer and more permanent than the giddy ground that is so perpetually crumbling under our feet, and dropping us into the grave; that man is not a breath, and all his faculties and labours, his fine sensibilities, and his generous ambitions, but the colourings of a cloud, the creatures of a gentler madness, the glitterings of phantasms and dreams."

The Spirit of the British Church .- " Whatever may be the invisible causes for this, one, I shall not hesitate to say, may be plainly seen; the fitness of the Church of England for the task of extinguishing the spiritual miseries of India. And what church is so fit for the guardianship? She inflicts no spiritual tyranny; she carries with her no inquisition; she demands no monkish severity of observance; she perverts the truth by no tradition; she lays no burden of pompous and heavy ceremonial on the neck of the people; she prohibits no knowledge; she frowns down no innocent custom; she abolishes no right of nature; the champion of truth and freedom in all things, she shuts up no Scripture; she coerces no pro-On this last point her principles selytism. must be mistaken no longer, even by those who have dealt most largely in the terrors of change. could not fabricate a peaceable community out discouraged and dying, a subscription was proof an irreligious people. The heart is the spring of good and evil. The Scriptures alone can reach it. From the pulpit, in its wise and honest zeal, in its eloquence, chastened courage, and scriptural integrity, must go forth the Spirit that reconciles and heals; and this must be the pulpit of the Established Church. In all our history there is no fact more thoroughly demonstrable, than the vital connexion of British prosperity with that church. The hour that sees her shaken, will see more than the tarnishing of crosiers and mitres. All sectarianism is republican. For the encouragement of the church, she has only to revert to days four days he is going to sail, leaving these when, though every step was through the ashes of her martyrs, she made good her victory, alike apparent concern. Adieu, my dear for king and people. With the Liturgy for her many absurdities take place here as in other language, the Articles for her law, the virtues of her Halls and Latimers for her example, the is truly dreadful not to leave in peace those Scriptures for her faith, the good of man for her who are peaceable. The people of Pitcairn desire, and God for her dependence, the Church of England cannot fail."

In these days of reform, we shall have the last quotation fiercely questioned; if the strife arise, be it remembered that we are reviewers, not combatants. The following is the paper mentioned above.

Tahiti, and the Pitcairn Islanders.

The United Service Journal for January, at the close of a very bitter attack upon the missionaries in Tahiti, quotes a letter from the spot to a scientific gentleman, which contains the following statements: — "I have already mentioned, that in the two English ships were brought all the inhabitants of Pitcairn. Nothing could be worse than to bring these good and virtuous people into this gulf of corruption. The first moral lesson they received on their arrival, was to see about fifty women of Tahiti swim off to the ships in which they were, and commit in their presence, with the sailors, such acts of debauchery, that they instantly desired to return to their own island. Two days afterwards, however, they were landed at Papaoa, in the midst of the most corrupt people of the island. From thence they solicited and obtained permission to come to Papiete; but this was of small avail, for you know that, at Tahiti, every where there exist but more or less of the same practices. If we are to credit the assertions of these people, they did not willingly quit their island, but did so at the instigation of those who went to seek them, and on condition that they should be brought back to Pitcairn, if they were not pleased with Tahiti. Notwithstanding, this promise was not fulfilled, for although they said to the commander that they would have preferred dying of thirst in their own island to living amongst so corrupt a people as those of Tahiti, the Comet sailed, and left them here, not, however, before its commander had secured them a piece of land and provisions for six months. Six weeks have now clapsed since the departure of the ships; and six of the inhabitants of Pitcairn are already dead, of whom two were fathers of families, leaving each six children. The remainder are moves the restraints upon his natural liberty—lets in the light that suffers him to discover the dreariness of his dungeon for himself—breaks his fetter, and then leaves him to follow the gleam, step by step, up to the perfect day."

The Political Power of Religion.—"We must look to no humbler influence than religion for these interesting people to their own island, tutes that ever loaded the shelves of legislation, ing to visit some islands in this schooner, would in a small vessel which I have freighted to go to the neighbourhood of Pitcairn, twelve of them have embarked, for the purpose of preserving the stock they left on their departure. I offered to make a so unfortunate as to be prevented from seeing Lear on Mondaylast, by attending, much against his will, his duty on Tuesday next, if, as he hears in the world, Mr. Garrick is to perform either Ling Loar, Mooth have a box. Although Lady North have a box. Although Lady North lives in a house these interesting people to their own island. But Mr. Darling, one of the missionaries, wishing to visit some islands in this schooner, would in the stead."

posed to defray the expenses of this same schooner of the missionaries, to carry them to Pitcairn. This would not occupy more than from three to six weeks at the most; Messrs. Pritchard, Wilson, and Nott, (missionaries,) would themselves have subscribed for this benevolent purpose, but Mr. Darling refuses, being determined not to delay his voyage. The probable consequence will be, that these unfortunate people must all die, if some means of restoring them to their island are not soon found. Nothing, however, can touch the heart of the reverend gentleman: within three or unhappy people to their fate, without the least parts of this best of all possible worlds. But it were certainly the most interesting people on the earth. Twice I have visited their island, and twice I have been enchanted with their frank and cordial hospitality, with the purity of their manners, and the goodness of their hearts. But all this will soon be lost; for if they remain here, those who do not die will not long continue as they were before their arrival. Among this corrupt people, they will soon full into similar practices, - at all events, the young. They had scarcely been here eight days, when some native men came and danced naked before some of their young females, who were going to bathe in the river. You may make any use of this, in order that the truth may be known in England; for I am convinced that the English government would not have sent the poor Pitcairnians to Tahiti but through the representations of the missionaries.

We have copied this melancholy description with great pain, and can only hope, as the debate runs high between the missionaries and their opponents, that it may be coloured by prejudice.

GARRICK CORRESPONDENCE. [Second Notice.]

ENCORE! is generally an agreeable theatrical sound, and we trust our readers will have no objection to it in this instance. The letters from eminent individuals, praying for places to see Garrick during his last nights, are curious documents, and bear testimony to his wonderful powers. The annexed account of the last performance, addressed to a lady who had paid him great attentions in France, is peculiarly interesting.

If my multiplicity of business would permit, I should be at your feet almost as soon as this reaches your hands: but we have made a vow to be happy as soon as our worldly cares will permit us; till when, we beg that our warmest and best wishes may be presented to your fellow-traveller, the Chevalier Chatteleux, and all our friends: we never can forget them or your most flattering kindness."

The following is a good commentary.

" Sir James Marriott to Mr. Garrick. "College of Advocates, Doctors' Commos
"July 6, 1776.

"Sir-When I met you a few days ago, it was with singular pleasure I saw a man who had just departed this stage look so wonderfully well. You have had the philosophy to resign thrones and diadems in good time and with good grace; a great exit is every thing; and I hope now you will have philosophy enough never to repent it; as the few kings and emperors in history, who have resigned, I fear always have done. Your epitaph may be almost as short as Ben Jonson's; it may be said of you, 'He followed Nature and he died.' You must have one great satisfaction in reflecting that you will always live in the minds and memories of your countrymen and in their history, while the world of arts and letters shall exist; and that, till you really quit for the true last time the scene, the respect you will meet with from all orders of men will alleviate many a pain and many a chagrin. Your countrymen have been too long inspired by you with exalted sentiments, and been relieved by your vivacity and fire from the weight of their blood and atmosphere, ever to forget the obligations they owe to you. Although you lay aside the dagger and the sceptre, the sock and the buskin, you still hold your pen; if you use it, it will contribute to keep you in health and spirits, and to give life to others. Continue then to adorn the scene with your wit, which you have filled so greatly with your action. You cannot leave the world, nor will it leave heavy ecclesiastical law which I sent you.

' As the Pontick sea, Whose icy current and compulsive course Ne'er knows retiring ebb, but keeps due on To the Propontis and the Hellespont.'

The Pontick sea is neither more nor less than the gout, morbus arthriticus, or aeteiris, because the joints serve as a bridge for the inflammable matter to pass over: icy current, because the gout is a cold humour (mistaken by Moorfields quacks for a hot one); and compulsive course, because it drives every thing before it. Then the sweet-eyed poet couches his advice (perhaps prophetically to you who are his eldest son) by saying, it ne'er knows or feels (that is, never should know or feel) retiring ebb: in other words, it should be still drove on to the Propontis (i. e.) the os pubis, and the Hellespont; which, by the by, is a false reading, for the author certainly wrote it Heel's Point.

• "This letter, signed Warburton, is a pleasantry of Colman's. The signature must not mislead the reader. The learned bishop was still living; but dead to every thing sportive, and plunged in the deepest dejection by the loss of his only son; he lingered in malancholy abstraction from the world until 1779. His friend Hurd saw him during that interval—

I wish you and Pen. and my fair niece, would come to my relief, or you will lose my custom at Hampton. This country affords remedies for all complaints, as you will see by the enclosed, which my landlord sends you with his compliments, and an offer of his inn for your accommodation. He is a very civil, obliging man; keeps a good larder; has laid in a large stock of the best wines, which he perfectly understands the management of, tastes them all himself; pays the utmost attention to his guests, whether they drink wine, sea-water, or , as I have experienced. In short, he is very clever in his way, having been long in business, and can only be excelled by the politeness of my two landladies, who, to their perfect knowledge in the management of the public business of the inn, add the benevolence of administering health to their neighbours; but have by that means introduced a most barbarous custom into the country, of not giving burial to the dead, under 100 years of age, for which reason the people never begin to be sick till 99. The consequence is, the ladies are worshipped as divinities, the churchyard lies fallow, and the sexton is ruined, and must either dig a grave for himself, or lie above-ground. His place, not like the places at St. James's, is not even solicited for; nor will any one accept it, unless the person take it as a sinecure, and then he must take the burial fees at the time of baptism, or he too will be ruined. If I could have picked it up at an old stall, I would not have given you the trouble of looking for it. I was told that you was lately facetious about or upon me; as I am conscious I am a good butt for your wit, I am not at all concerned about it, and am rather pleased that I can be a matter of amusement to you and your friends. I know there was no harm meant, and therefore there is no room left for any petulant concern about; but there is one thing gave me pain, (I do not speak of a late time,) and that was that I had done you ill offices with the Duke of Leeds. Being fully conscious I had not, it gave me so much pain I applied to his grace, who said in these words, or very like them. Done Garrick ill offices with me! Lord, Doctor, I dare say I have used you ill, for puffing him to me perpetually, and making me believe there was not his fellow upon earth.' This I was told by a very respectable man, and whom you think so; and so the matter lies between you and him, and there let it lie. He told me himself that you said so to him. I never thought of it more; I knew you had wit and joke, but never thought you dealt in malice. The first instance you shewed of it to me was in that very unfriendly and abusive letter you wrote me, and an anonymous one too, upon a d-d confounded lie told you upon, I thought, a very pardonable freedom: however, these matters are all over and done with, and when you are at leisure, look out for a man who has a greater respect and esteem for you than I had. If I gave you the 'Macrobius,' pray keep it, that I may do by you what to the best of my memory you never did by me for any favour shewn to you. As to the matter of the Duke of Leeds, I have done with it after what I have said in my last. The gentleman who told it me spoke of it the next day, or a very few days after; whether he mistook you, or I him, I neither know nor care. I shall say nothing, but I have my own thoughts. You affirm you have no malice in your constitution, but in a world so tainted with it as this is, a very cautious man may have a little stick to him in spite of his care. I think I see the shadow of it in you; but whether you have a load of the substance in you I know not; and care very little, since I am now in all probability removed far from any severe or very injurious stroke of it. Our drugs indeed worked in different ways, but I hope and believe that mine were as wholesome and salutary as yours. Spain in 1830.

WE have only to resume the broken thread of our extract from this able work; -it is an interesting description of the court and leading men of Madrid.

"The man who has most the ear of the king, is Don Francisco Tudeo Calomarde, minister of justice, as he is called in Spain. The private opinions of Calomarde are decidedly apostolical; but the opinions of his colleagues being more moderate, he is obliged to conceal his sentiments, and to pretend an accordance with theirs. The ministers who accordance with theirs. are reputed to be moderate in sentiment, are Don Luis Ballasteros, minister of finance; Don Luis Maria Salagar, minister of marine, and generally considered the most able in the cabinet; and Don Manuel Gonsalez Salmon, secretary of state, and nominally prime minister. This minister for several years held only the office of interim secretary of state; because, as was generally believed, etiquette forcing the king to take the prime minister along with him to his country palace, the advancement of Salmon would have deprived Calomarde of this privilege: lately, however, Salmon has been named secretary of state without reserve, probably because he would not serve upon other conditions; or, according to another version, because he threatened Calomarde with some exposé if he opposed his advancement. Calomarde, unquestionably no fool, is understood to keep all together; the minister of the marine is the only other man of talent, and he is a new man, possessing little influence, and who could not for a moment support himself against Calomarde; he was only a few months ago presented with the rank of general, that etiquette might enable him to hold some office with which the king wished to reward his services. But Calomarde had not the king's undivided ear; and, if report speak truly, he has taletelling and cabal to encounter, as well as those in inferior stations. There are other two individuals who, without high state offices, possess great private influence, and are generally looked upon in the light of favourites. These are the Duque de Alegon and Salsedo. The former was appointed last autumn to the office of captain-general of the guard-an office that keeps him much about the king's person. This Alegon is a dissipated old man, long known to the king, and who used, in former days, to pander to his pleasures; the king has never forgotten the convenient friend of his younger days, and right to drop your intelligence about the Duke has now thought of rewarding him. The ser- &c. &c. The keepers mounted upon the backs of Leeds; but you had been more right not to vices of the Duque de Alegon refer to many of the animals, and made them trot round the years back. Before the king wedded his bigot wife, not affection, but religious fear kept him faithful during that connexion; and now the love he bestows upon the young queen entirely supersedes any call upon the services of Alegon. The other individual, who is justly considered the royal favourite par excellence, is Salsedo, who holds the office of private secretary. dishonourable link formerly bound him to his sovereign, and he still retains his influence. It is generally known, that previous to the marriage of the king with his present wife, the wife of Salsedo was in royal favour. Salsedo is decidedly a man of good tact, if not of talent; his having retained his post fourteen years is some proof of both. His principles are understood to be moderate; at all events his advice is so, for he has sense to perceive that an oppo-site policy would probably accelerate the ruin of both his master and himself. Salsedo possesses more influence in the closet than Calomarde—the king likes him better, and confides in him more. The influence of Calomarde is not favouritism; the king looks to his opinion because he trusts to his knowledge. There are still one or two others who have something to say at court, particularly the Duque d'Higar, the best man of the Camarilla, and a man both of talent and information; but the influence of the Duque d'Higar is not great. The favourite valet de chambre, who died of apoplexy some months ago, was also fast creeping en towards high favour; and his death has thrown more influence into the hands of Salsedo. But it is now generally supposed, that the rising influence of the queen will in due time discard every other influence about court. No king and queen ever lived more happily together than the present king and queen of Spain. The king is passionately attached to her; and it is said she is perfectly satisfied with her lot. He spends the greater part of the day in her apartments; and when engaged in council, leaves it half a dozen times in the course of an hour or two, to visit his queen. The habits of the court are extremely simple: the king rises at six, and breakfasts at seven; he spends the morning chiefly with the queen, but receives his ministers and secretary at any time before two; at half-past two he dines, always in company with the queen. Dinner occupies not more than an hour; and shortly after, he and the queen drive out together: he sups at half-past eight, and retires early. The queen does not rise so early as the king; she breakfasts at nine, and the king always sits by her. There is scarcely any galety at court. The queen is fond of retirement; and excepting now and then a private concert, there are no court diversions. While I was in Madrid, the favourite pastime of the king and queen was of rather an extraordinary kind; especially as the queen was on the eve of her accouchement. It consisted in looking at the wild beasts which are kept in the Retiro. Almost every evening, about five o'clock, the royal carriage might be seen crossing the Prado, on its way towards the menagerie; and as the Retiro was generally my afternoon lounge, I had frequent opportunities of seeing this royal diversion. There is a large square court about 200 yards across, enclosed with iron railings, and round the interior of this court are the cages of the wild animals; and in this court sat the king and queen upon a bench, while the animals were turned out for their amusement,—such of them at least as were peaceable,—camels, elephants, zebras, area; and when this had been done often enough to please their majesties, the beasts were led in front of their royal visitors, and made to kneel, - which act of homage, however, they sometimes refused to perform. Upon one occasion, the man who rode the camel, not being able to keep his seat, turned his face towards the tail, sitting upon the neck of the animal; their majesties were in ecstasies at this exhibition; the king, I thought, would have died with laughing. I was witness, another time, to a strange scene of rivalry between the king and Don Carlos. When the king's carriage drove up to the gate of the court, Don Carlos and his wife and family were seated in the area, and his carriage was in waiting: upon this occasion, the king arrived in state; a party of dragoons attended him, and his coachmen were in court dresses. The carriage of Don Carlos was in strange contrast with that of the king; it was drawn by six mules, harnessed with ropes; in place of postilions in court dresses, his servants were in the dress of Spanish peasants in their holyday clothes, -- one on the coach-box,— the other employed as a runner by the head of the mules. Don Carlos affects all this appearance of simplicity and Spanish usage, to please the people; and for the same reason, his wife generally appears in a mantilla. The moment the king's carriage appeared, Don Carlos left the court with his wife, and continued to walk in the most crowded part of the garden while the king and queen remained, dividing the attention which their majesties would otherwise have received, and indeed engrossing the larger share of it. I could not avoid remarking the greater popularity of Don Carlos among the lower orders: while they only took off their hats as the king passed, they bowed almost to the ground at the presence of the Infante. The appearance of the queen, however, always produced a favourable impression, especially when contrasted with that of her aspiring rival. One cannot look at the spouse of Don Carlos, without perceiving that she covets a crown; while in the countenance of the queen we read indifference to it. Upon frequent other occasions while in Madrid, I had proofs of the anxiety of Don Carlos to recommend himself to the people. The most marked of these was upon the evening when the queen gave birth to a princess: not an hour after this was known, the Infante drove through the streets and along the Prado, in an open carriage, along with his three sons, who, by the repeal of the Salic law, were that day cut out of their inheritance. The event to which I have alluded—the accouchement of the queen-was a matter of deep interest in Madrid; and before its accomplishment there was the utmost anxiety among all ranks. Each party had its own views. moderate, or government party, and many belonging to the other parties, who desired peace and tranquillity, anxiously looked to the birth of a prince, as an event that would at once extinguish the claims of those who, but for the repeal of the Salic law, would have had a right to the throne, in case of the birth of a princess. The Carlists secretly wished that the event might be precisely the opposite; and the liberal party, seeing some possible advantage in whatever should tend to unsettle the existing government, united their wishes with those of the Carlists: but the great majority of the respectable inhabitants, perceiving in the birth of a prince a guarantee for the tranquillity of the kingdom, and the security of property, devoutly wished that such

the public mind was fully partaken by the government; for it was well known to the heads of the state that conspiracies were on foot; and that, in the event of the birth of a princess, the Carlists would have a pretext for an open manifestation of their views. They, however, had resolved not to wait this event, but to anticipate it; and a plot, which might possibly have proved successful, and which, at all events, must have led to scenes of blood, perhaps to revolution, was fortunately discovered on the day before that appointed for its execution; and the most prompt measures were immediately taken for crushing it. On the fifth of October, about midnight, carriages, accompanied by sufficient escorts, were taken to the houses of Padre Cirilo, the chief of the Franciscan order of friars; of Don Rufini Gonsalez, of Don Man. Herro, both counsellors of state, and of thirteen others; the conspirators were put into the carriages, and driven off,-Cirilo to Seville, Rufino to La Mancha, and the others to different places distant from the metropolis. The conspirators intended that some of the heads should have repaired to the inner court of the palace while the king was engaged in his evening drive; that about a thousand of the royalist volunteers-who are for the most part Carlists-should assemble at the palace-yard; that the entrance to the palace should be taken possession of; the king seized upon his return, and forced to change his ministers, and to restore the Salic law. I feel little doubt, that if this plot had not been discovered, it would have led to more than a change of ministers. Among the military, and even among the guards, there are many discontented men, who fancy they see in the elevation of Don Carlos a guarantee for a more impartial system of promotion; and the royalist volunteers of Madrid, 6000 strong, and all provided with arms, and accustomed to manœuvre them, are, with few exceptions, of the lowest classes, and chiefly Carlists. I walked to the palace-yard the evening when it was expected the event would be known: it presented a dense mass of persons, chiefly of bourgeois and of the middle classes, all waiting with anxiety the announcement of the event, upon which the tranquillity of the country so greatly derended. At length the white flag-the announcement of a princess—was slowly hoisted. There was a universal and audible expression of disappointment: 'Que lastima! que lasti-ma!' and the crowd slowly dispersed."

There is matter still sufficient for a dozen quotations; but we must content ourselves with what we have already given, and the again recommending to our readers this Spanish olla podrida, though from an English kitchen.

CHOLERA.

Thoughts on the best means of lessening the destructive Progress of Cholera; in a Letter to the Right Hon. Viscount Melbourne. By Joshun Brookes, F.R.S., &c. London, 1831. Rules for the Prevention of the Asiatic Cholera, &c. By W. Ingledew, Esq. Cheltenham, 1831.

Observations on the Nature of Malignant Cholera, &c. By A. P. W. Philip, M.D., F.R.S.L. and E. London, 1831. Renshaw and Rush.

Letters on the Cholera in Prussia. By F. W. Becker, M.D. Letter I., to John Thomson, M.D., F.R.S., &c. London, 1832. Murray. The venerable Joshua Brookes has published a letter on cholera, in which he recommends, what has certainly been hitherto very much neglected—the immediate conversion of large buildings in London to the purposes of cholera hospitals, and fumigation according to Guyton de Morveau's plan.

If the good people of Cheltenham content themselves with the perusal of Mr. Ingledew's pamphlet, we fear they will know very little about the disease.

Dr. Wilson Philip's pamphlet, and the first letter of Dr. Becker, are very laudable additions to the facts accumulating on this interesting and important subject. The proof of the utility of theoretical views in physiology are, as in most other things, put to the test by their applicability to facts; and the light which Dr. Philip's views throw on some of the most intricate symptoms of the disease, are at once proofs of the worth and soundness of his doctrines. Dr. Becker's letter is the most valuable collection of facts that have yet been published on this malady; and they do more towards elucidating its history than even the essence of discussions with which we have from time to time endeavoured to furnish our readers. The death of this clever and assiduous young physician has been announced in the daily papers; and we can from personal knowledge say, that we do not know one of the numerous victims to the pestilence more to be regretted.

The National Magazine of Fashion; with eight coloured Engravings. No. I. London, 1832. J. Mitchell.

FILLED with gay ladies, decorated heads, and all "the pomp and garniture of fashion." But what amuses us most is the advertising sheet. What with oils, creams, soaps—to say nothing of wigs—how beautiful every body ought to be!, Besides, the present magazine appeals to our patriotism.

Standard Novels, No. XI. The Hungarian Brothers. By Anna Maria Porter. London, 1832. Colburn and Bentley.

A PLEASANT introduction, but with nothing sufficiently striking for quotation, ushers in the Hungarian Brothers. The frontispiece is one of the very prettiest we have seen, though it has as little to do with the novel as possible. A very sweet-looking girl, in a quakerish-like peasant dress, is regarding a letter at her feet. Now this is no representation of the high-born heroine, on whose pearl-bound tresses and velvet dress Miss Porter dwells with the delight of congenial taste.

Change of Air; or, the Diary of a Philosopher in Pursuit of Health and Recreation, &c. By James Johnson, M.D. Physician Extraordinary to the King. Second edition. London, 1831. Highley.

DR. JOHNSON'S curious book has, we are glad to see, reached a second edition. This is the best testimony of its merits; and full as it is of interesting matter and varied information, it will long be read as a proof of what can be accomplished by an observing mind, accompanied by habits of labour and reflection.

The Principles and Practice of Obstetric Medicine: in a Scries of systematic Dissertations on Midwifery and the Diseases of Women and Children. Illustrated with Plates. By D. D. Davis, M.D. Professor of Midwifery in the University of London. Parts I. and II. London, 1831. Taylor.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

EUGENE ARAM: PHRENOLOGY. To the Editor of the Literary Gazette.

London, Dec. 9, 1831.

SIR, - With the highest admiration for the beauty and novelty of Mr. Lytton Bulwer's philosophisings, I have (perhaps from previous prejudice,) but little sympathy for his hero Eugene Aram, whose lofty qualities seem to me to hang around him like an ill-fitting garment, and whose career but little merited to be canonised by genius. But this is mere matter of opinion; and as the book is in every body's hands, and meritedly so, perhaps the communication of the following curious par-ticulars may neither be deemed ill-timed nor unacceptable.

Some years since, a gentleman residing at _____, in the _____ Riding of Yorkshire, who was no less celebrated for his ardour in procuring curiosities, than for his skill in dispensing medicines, resolved, by one bold achievement, to enrich his museum with a unique, which should at once excite the envy, and defy the reach, of all less fortunate collectors. The object was attainable by a man of resolution; and on a dark and stormy night, agitated by conflicting feelings, like a bridegroom on the eve of marriage, the doctor sallied forth from the town of Knaresborough, with a ladder on his shoulder, and with the firm purpose of mounting the gibbet and detaching from the iron hoop which bound it the skull of Eugene Aram. The gibbet clung to its own property with wonderful tenacity; but the ardor of the doctor became a furor, and he succeeded in extricat-ing another neck almost at the risk of his own. The skull was for many years the rich jewel of the virtuoso's cabinet; until death, who spares not even friendship, dissolved the intimacy, and sent the doctor to another Golgotha. The skull of Eugene Aram thence came into the possession of a gentleman of great literary and scientific acquirements, residing in the neighbourhood; and in the year 1817, a friend, who was on a visit to him from the metropolis. and who had lately been in company with Dr. Spurzheim, introduced in conversation the subject of phrenology; in the course thereof, it recurred to the parties that the doctrine might be put to a very fair test, by submitting to the professor, for his judgment, without comment or information, two skulls belonging to wellknown and remarkable persons. The doctor's consent being obtained, two skulls were placed in a box and forwarded to him; the former tenant of one was Eugene Aram, the other belonged to a no less remarkable personage, Adam de Thirsk, the last abbot of Fountains, who was hanged for denying the supremacy of Henry VIII. He was otherwise of bad character, as appears by the account given of him by Dugdale in his Monasticon, and was a stanch anti-reformer, which his enemies accounted for from the extraordinary thickness of his skull. This was taken out of his coffin at Fountains

Abbey by the same indefatigable collector, who must have been a phrenologist by anticipation, and whose memory we trust will be honoured by the notice of the Society.*

Dr. Spurzheim's reply was as follows; and I subjoin to it that of a professional gentleman of great eminence, who was the channel of communication.

"23, Foley Place, London, 22d May, 1817.

"My dear sir, - The parcel containing the two skulls is arrived; and I am very much obliged for your kind attention to afford me an opportunity of studying man. Only with this view and not to gratify curiosity, I will mention what I think of the skulls, in conformity with our preceding observations. I am, however, always ready to be corrected by new facts.

"I do not know how far you are acquainted with the true spirit of our inquiries, since, in the public reports, they have been wilfully misrepresented; I only state, that we cannot distinguish the actions of man, but confine our physiological and philosophical observations to the natural dispositions in healthy brains, without exercise.

"One of the two skulls is positively that of a man; the other resembles that of a woman, and if it belonged to a man, his mind entered into a female habitation. The female had a good share of common sense, without being able to reason deeply; she was pleased with witty, amusing, and superstitious stories, and foud of theatrical performances. She had strong feelings, without great hope-a great deal of vanity, attachment, and personal courage; she might have been able to commit an error to please those whom she liked. Example was to her particularly important; she was not indifferent as to sexual intercourse was more easily guided by soft means and flattering treatment than by command, which revolted her feelings, and would induce her to have recourse to desperate means.

"The man had talents for general information and judgment; he recollected easily persons he had seen before; he had the power of imitation in a higher degree; his feelings common to men and animals were very strong, such as physical love, selfishness, cunning, and personal courage. It was not easy to conduct him, since he liked to go his own way, and to follow his individual conscience. He belonged to the class of those who deserve great reward if they resist the abuses of their animal feelings. He certainly never forgot himself, and stood in need of the commandment—' Thou shalt not covet.' He resembles those who in insanity destroy others and themselves. I even doubt whether his brain was healthy to the end of his days-the skull has not the appearance.

"Pray let me hear the names, actions, and characters of these two persons, as far as they are known, in order to confirm, refute, or modify our observations. If their natural cha racter have prevailed over education, I will take casts of them. Meanwhile, I am, with much regard, your obliged SPURZHEIM."

" My dear --, on the other side you have Spurzheim's opinion in detail. It seems well drawn up; and I have nothing to add, except that I think the opinion is warranted by the doctrines of his system. The larger head is certainly that of a man; the smaller seems to be a woman's. Of the former, I should certainly not think favourably; there is a great deal too much of the animal in it—selfishness, covetiveness, lust, and courage abound. The woman is much better; and her moral quali-ties would have been probably sufficient to keep her animal propensities under proper subjection; but her vanity and attachment render her liable to be led astray by bad example; and if she was the wife, or connected with the man, she was probably led into the commission of crime by him. She has a greater degree of courage than is generally seen in female heads. Remember, I am all anxiety to hear the stories and character of these individuals. Believe me yours, &c.

"P.S. From the ivory density of the bone of the man's skull, it seems probable that he was not sane at his death. I should not be surprised to hear he was a suicide.'

Previously to acquainting Spurzheim with the names of the tenants of the skulls, he was informed that the one he presumed to be a female was that of a male: he thereupon transmitted a letter (unfortunately lost) full of curious remarks upon the skulls of the different great families or tribes of mankind, and pro-nounced Aram's skull to resemble that of a Celt. It is a singular coincidence, that Aram himself boasts of his Celtic blood. His skull is now in the library of a friend at ____ close to Aram in ____shire, or, as it is now spelt, Eryholme.

It is also remarkable that he should in his defence have spoken of the difficulty of distinguishing male from female bones, when his own head was destined to puzzle a professor.

Another extraordinary circumstance alluded to by Aram in his defence-the escape of the prisoner, double-ironed, from York Castle—was only cleared up a few years ago, by the discovery of a skeleton in irons—the very irons between two walls, the outer and inner ones of the prison, betwixt which he had doubtless fallen and perished. I am, sir, yours,

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

SCIENTIFIC EXPEDITIONS.

In the midst of the careful economy which is observed in every branch of the state, the Board of Admiralty, we are happy to perceive, retain that regard for the advancement of hydrographical knowledge which distinguished their predecessors in office. The first scientific expedition ordered by the present board is intrusted to the command of Captain Fitzroy, who has recently sailed in his Majesty's ship Beagle from Plymouth. Captain Fitzroy was employed in the vessel he now commands under the orders of Captain King, in his arduous survey of the dangerous coasts of Tierra del Fuego; notices of which will be found in the Literary Gazettes of the period. From the intricate nature of the southern shores of South America, and the extent to be examined, much was necessarily left unexplored by Captain King; and to complete this important survey, in the first instance, is the object of Captain Fitzroy's mission. After performing this service, the Beagle will cross the Pacific, and make observations upon the various coralline islands with which that ocean is studded near the equator. Captain Fitzroy will also visit the coast of New South Wales, ! to determine several points of a nature important to navigators; after which the Beagle will cross the Indian ocean, and return to England by the Cape of Good Hope. In addition to a vast number of chronometers and scientific instruments, Captain Fitzroy is accompanied by a draftsman (Mr. Earle), from whose skill and ability in his art, together with the various talents of the officers of the vessel, we may expect a rich harvest in the several branches of natural history, on the return of the Beagle.

[•] We hope our phrenological assailants will acknowledge our good nature in thus illustrating their science, after all their abuse of us; and giving them a more curious paper than any they have themselves published. In truth, we harbour no hostility against their nonsense when they go their absurd lengths; and we only laugh at the tirades in their Transactions, and at their president Dr. Elliotson's Lectures, which are directed so ficrcely at the Societary wrote to. our heads; for we remember that the Secretary wrote to us to say—"Do notice the Phrenological Society in the Literary Gazette: we do not care how much you censure or satirise us—only do not pass us by in silence." Seeing thus that their great object was notoriety, we gave it them; and the organs of ingratitude fell foul on their benefactors.—Ed. L. G.

We take the present opportunity of noticing that his Majesty's ship Etna, commanded by Captain Belcher, has also recently sailed for the coast of Africa, to resume the survey of that coast to the southward of Cape Verga, a part which has hitherto remained unexplored.

TRAVELS IN APRICA.

Two young Frenchmen, brothers, of the name of Verreau, have lately returned from an expedition into the interior of Africa. One of these interesting naturalists, who is scarcely eighteen years of age, has spent above twenty months in traversing the savage region which lies north of the country of the Hottentots, between Cape Natal and the west coast above Saint Helen's Bay. We shall not attempt to relate the privations and the dangers which these travellers incurred from the natives of this zone of Africa - blacks, as ferocious as the wild beasts among whom they dwell. We will only mention some of the curiosities they collected in their expedition. Men, quadrupeds, birds, fish, plants, minerals, shells, they have studied, and brought home specimens of every thing. They procured, in hunting, tigers, lions, hyenas, a beautiful burbalus, a purple antelope of singular elegance, a variety of other specimens of the same family, two giraffes, monkeys, polecats, some very curious rats, an ostrich, birds of prey which have never yet been described, and a great number of other birds, of all sizes, colours, and species. They have made a collection of nests, which might furnish a subject for an interesting essay; roots, bulbs, and other ve-getable productions of a remarkable organisation, or of uncommon size; serpents, a cachalot, and a crocodile of a hitherto unknown variety. But the greatest curiosity is an individual of the race of the Betjouanas. This man, who has been preserved by the methods used by naturalists to prepare such specimens as they intend to exhibit in their original form, is of low stature, black skin, the head covered with a short and thick wool. He is armed with a lance and arrows, clothed in an antelope's skin, with a head-dress composed of porcupine quills, adorned with glass beads, seeds, and small bones. An ornament, which we do not know how to describe, as we should be at a loss for suitable expressions to characterise this peculiar article of the dress of the Betjouanas. particularly struck us. - From a Foreign Journal.

BOYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.

JANUARY 9. G. B. Greenough, Esq. V. P., in the chair. Three communications were read: 1. Remarks relative to the Geography of the Maldivers Islands, by Captain Horsburgh, hydrographer to the Hon. the East India Company. 2. Particulars of an Expedition up the Essequibo and Massaroony rivers, by Captain J. E. Alexander. 3. A Letter from Mr. Dupuis, British consul at Tripoli, to the Secretary of the Asiatic Society, and forwarded to the Royal Geographical Society by direction of the Earl of Munster.

1. Captain Horsburgh observes of the Maldivers Islands, that it is remarkable, considering their near neighbourhood to the coasts of Malabar and Ceylon, and the constant intercourse maintained between them and several points of both, that they should, in themselves, be so little known. They consist, generally, of a long chain of low islets, 466 miles in length, but not above forty wide; and divided into circular groups, enclosing lagoons, and connected together by atols, as they are called, or coralline Between these no bottom is found, even with 200 fathoms line; and within them the depth averages about thirty fathoms. Generally, three or four islands belong to each atol; but all small, not exceeding from three to five miles in circuit, and low, not above twelve or fourteen feet in height. The passages between them are not so well known as could be wished. The inhabitants are Mahometans, professed wreckers, and subsist almost entirely on cocoanuts and sugar.

2. The Coicony and Massarcony rivers join the Essequibo about 100 miles above its mouth; and at the confluence of the three the Dutch had at one time a capital city. This, however, with the cleared ground in its vicinity, has long been overrun again with forest; and the only remains are here and there a marble tombstone, or other fragment, which is encountered in forcing a way through the tangled under-wood. Above this point the Coioony is un-known; but the Massaroony, besides having been now in part ascended by Captain Alexan. der (advantageously known by his Travels in Persia and the Balkan), was last year examined above 250 miles up by Mr. Hilhouse, formerly of the staff-corps, and now settled as surveyor. in Georgetown, Demerara. He reports it to make a very broad bend, first to the west, and then again almost east, and even north-east, so that at two very distant points of its course, one part of it is not above three days' journey distant from the other. A number of feeders join it on both sides; and Mr. Hilhouse mentions a fall in one of 1100 feet height, (probably a mistake in the MS.) and in another of 500 feet. The sandstone in the neighbourhood of both still glitters with mica, as when it induced Sir Walter Raleigh to give the country the name of "El Dorado,"—for this is the district on which this designation was bestowed.

Captain Alexander dates his communication from on board H. M. S. Reindeer, bound to Cuba, whence he purposes to proceed to New Orleans, up the Mississippi and vale of the Ohio to Canada, and thence home. He promises to continue his correspondence while absent, and to give more ample details on his return.

3. Mr. Dupuis regrets that the unsettled state of the interior has lately disappointed all his hopes of recent information from the interior of Soudan, where he has agents; but announces the equipment of a considerable force by the Dey, with the view of scouring the country and collecting the tribute, now almost twelve months in arrear; the success of which, he hopes, will again open his communications.

The thanks of the Society were voted to the contributors of the above papers; and it was announced from the chair, that, in consequence of the press of valuable matter now in the hands of the Council, it was resolved to have an extraordinary meeting that day week, viz. Monday next, at the usual hour .- Adjourned.

LITERARY AND LEARNED.

ROYAL SOCIETY.

Dr. Bostock in the chair. - The Bakerian lecture, by Mr. Faraday, was read. This communication is an extension of Mr. Faraday's late discoveries in magneto-electricity as applied to terrestrial phenomena, and leads to a knowledge of the causes of certain terrestrial effects. The experiments made by Mr. Barlow on the disturbance of the magnetism on an iron ball when rotated, were suspected by Mr. Faraday to depend upon currents of electricity evolved in the moving ball by the magneto-electric induction of the earth; and this he found confirmed by rotating a brass ball,— a current of electricity around it being apparent so long as the rotation continued. Large extensions are next made to the state of the earth itself, revolving as it does on its own axis. Currents of positive electricity are considered as flowing, or tending to flow, from the equator both ways to the poles; and the philosophic author thinks it probable that the aurora borealis and australis are occasioned by the discharge of electricity thus accumulated.

On Thursday Mr. Faraday was engaged in experiments on the moving water of the Thames at Waterloo Bridge, and on the still water of the basin in Kensington Palace, which tend powerfully to bear out the many new and extensive views which he entertains on this interesting subject.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.

On Thursday this Society resumed their meetings; Mr. Hamilton in the chair.-Mr. Gage, by permission of the Duke of Devonshire, exhibited the Benedictional of St. Ethelwold, Bishop of Winchester, a manuscript of the tenth century, from his grace's library: it is most splendid, both in the illuminations and the general execution, and very nearly as clean and perfect as when it left the hands of the writer. Twenty engravings from the illuminations were hung up in the room. These were accompanied by a dissertation from Mr. Gage on the book exhibited, and on the mass in general, in which he entered into an historical account of the several sacramentaries, or rituals for the mass, which had been compiled at different times, and for particular countries and churches. The reading of Mr. Gage's paper was not concluded.

ROYAL ASIATIC SOCIETY.

THE Earl of Munster, V.P., in the chair. The following, among other donations, were laid on the table :- By Sir George Thos. Staunton, a copy of No. I. of the Canton Miscellany; an account of the Anglo-Chinese College at Malacca; a pass, or purwana, from Warren Hastings to Sir G. Leonard Staunton, to enable him to pass from Calcutta to Balasore; and two specimens of a talisman or ornament of good omen called a Joo-ee, which the Chinese are fond of placing in their chief apartments. Sir George states, that the finest specimens of the Joo-ee which he ever saw, were those sent by Lords Macartney and Amherst from the Emperor of China to the King of England. Each of these was made of a single piece of the rare and hard stone termed jade, and was of a milk-white colour. The largest of the two now presented by Sir George is of the same size as those just mentioned, but is made principally of wood, having three pieces of the precious mineral inlaid upon it: It was given to Sir George by the Vicercy of Canton, and would be valued in China at about 50*l*. sterling. The other is much smaller in size and is made of silver, having four Chinese characters engraved upon it, signifying "Omen of good, and wishes accomplished." The following geutlemen were elected members: T. Hyde Villiers, Esq. M.P. resident; John Sullivan, Esq. non-resident; their Excellencies Henry Wheaton and M. Van Buren, foreign; and Maharajah Kali Krishna Bahadur, corresponding. The papers read were, an account of the Jains of Goojerat and Mauvar, by Lieut.-Col. Miles; and an account of a Játra, or fair, near Surat, by the late Dr. White. The conclusion of each of these papers was deferred till the meeting of the 21st instant.

PINE ARTS. MEW PUBLICATIONS.

Picturesque Memorials of Salisbury. Drawings and Engravings by Mr. J. Fisher; Descriptive Letter-press by Rev. P. Hall, M.A. No. I. Salisbury, Brodie and Co.

THE publishers propose, "not only to preserve a faithful record of the venerable remains of Salisbury, as they at present stand, but to rescue from oblivion many traces of beauty and curiosity, which the lapse of ages, the fluctuations of taste, and the love of comfort and convenience, have already swept away." If we may judge from the first number, this intention will be carried into effect in a very pleasing and satisfactory manner. The work is to be completed in about eight numbers, and will contain nearly fifty copper-plates and wood-engravings.

Portraits and Memoirs of the most Illustrious Personages of British History. By Edmund Lodge, Esq., Norroy King of Arms, F.S.A. Harding and Lepard.

ALTHOUGH our former notices of this justly popular publication render it unnecessary to enter into any further details respecting it, we must express our gratification at observing that the two new monthly editions are going on steadily and punctually, and that the plates by which they are embellished are as highly finished, and as full of character, as their predecessors.

History of the County Palatine of Lancaster. By Edward Baines, Esq. The Biographical Department by W. R. Whatton, Esq. F.S.A. Part XI. Fisher, Son, and Jackson.

QUEENMORE Park and Pile of Fouldrey Castle are the embellishments of the eleventh part of Mr. Baines's valuable publication. They are equally beautiful in their way; the effect of the latter is quite Rembrandtish.

Devonshire and Cornwall illustrated. Nos. XXVIII. XXIX. and XXX. Fisher, Son, and Co.

Or the plates in these three numbers, Bickleigh Vale; the Hoe and Citadel at Plymouth, the Regatta starting (a highly animated scene); and Warlegh House, are our favourites.

England and Wales. From Drawings by J. M. W. Turner, Esq. R.A.; with Descriptive and Historical Illustrations by H. E. Lloyd, Esq. No. XIII. Moon, Boys, and Graves.

"RICH MOND Hill and Bridge," "Malvern Abbey and Gate," "Plymouth," and "Salisbury," are the subjects of the present Number; and are marked with all the excellences and all the peculiarities of Mr. Turner's style. He has imparted to them, in general, great grandeur and breadth of effect; but we are at a loss to understand why he is fond of intro-

other is much smaller in size and is made of silver, having four Chinese characters engraved upon it, signifying "Omen of good, and wishes accomplished." The following gentlemen were composition, he has chosen to spot his land-elected members: T. Hyde Villiers, Esq. M.P.

Perch. Painted by C. Hardy; engraved on stone by F. W. Wilkin. Ackermann. Izaak Walton himself would have been proud of exhibiting such " prodigies of piscetory perfection."

The King. From a Drawing by A. Morton; on stone by R. Lane, A.R.A. London, Dickinson.

A BEAUTIFULLY executed lithographic print from a portrait belonging to Lady Falkland: there is, however, something in the mouth which does not recommend this to us as the most striking or agreeable likeness of his Majesty.

Characteristic Sketches of Animals. Drawn from the Life and engraved by Thomas Landseer; with Descriptive Notices by John Barrow, Esq. Part VII. Moon, Boys, and Graves.

OF the plates which ornament the seventh Part of this clever and entertaining publication, "The Gnu," (so singularly omitted by Blumenbach in his Manual of the Elements of Natural History,) and the "Ourang-Outang," that alarmingly near approach to humanity, are the most striking. The vignettes, especially those attached to the descriptions of the Gnu and the Ourang-Outang, are full of Mr. Thomas Landseer's peculiar humour.

Select Visus of the Principal Cities of Europe.
From Original Paintings by Lieutenant-Colonel Batty, F.R.S. Part V. Moon, Boys, and Graves.

REPRISENTATIONS of the four great cities of Holland and Belgium — Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Brussels, and Antwerp—executed with Colonel Batty's usual fidelity and taste, form this, the fifth, and, we regret to add, the concluding Part of a work which we had hoped would have been much more extensive. The existence of several annual publications exclusively devoted to picturesque and local scenery, which their proprietors, depending upon an extensive circulation, are enabled to publish at a reduced price, is the reason assigned for bringing the present series of views to a termination.

ORIGINAL POSTRY.

CHRIST MAS.

bregular Lines.

Now out upon you, Christmas!
Is this the merry time
When the red hearth blazed, the harper sung,
And the bells rung their glorious chime?

You are called marry Christmas— Like many that I know, You are living on a character Acquired long ago.

The dim lamps glimmer o'er the streets;
Through the dun and murky air
You may not see the moon or stars,
For the fog is heavy there;

As if all high and lovely things
Were blotted from the sight,
And Earth had nothing but herself

A gloomy crowd goes harrying by; And in the lamplight's glare, Many a heavy step is seen, And many a face of care.

I saw an aged woman turn
To her wretched home again—
All day she had asked charity,
And all day asked in vain.

The fog was on the cutting wind,
The frost was on the flood;
And yet how many past that night
With neither fire nor food!

There came on the air a smother'd groan,
And a low and stifled cry,
And there struggled a child, a young fair child,
In its mortal agony.

"Now for its price," the murderer said;
"On earth we must live as we can;
And this is not a crime, but a sacrifice

In the cause of science and man."

Is this the curse that is laid on the earth?

And must it ever be so,

That there can be nothing of human good

But must from some evil flow?

On, on, and the dreary city's smoke
And the fog are left behind,
And the leafless boughs of the large eld trees
Are stirred by the moaning wind;

And all is calm, like the happy dream
Which we have of an English home—
A lowly roof where cheerful toil
And healthy slumbers come.

Is there a foreign foe in the land,
That the midnight sky grows red—
That by homestead, and barn, and rick, and stack,

You cruel blaze is fed?

There were months of labour, of rain, and sun, Ere the harvest followed the plough— Ere the stack was reared, and the barn was filled,

Which the fire is destroying now.

And the dark incendiary goes through the night

With a fierce and wicked joy;
The wealth and the food which he may not share,

He will at least destroy.

The wind, the wind, it comes from the sea,
With a wailing sound it passed;
'Tis soft and mild for a winter's wind,
And yet there is death on the blast.

From the south to the north hath the Cholera come.

He came like a despot king;
He hath swept the earth with a conqueror's step,
And the air with a spirit's wing.

We shut him out with a girdle of ships,

And a guarded quarantine:

What ho! now which of your watchers slept?

The Cholera's past your line!

There's a curse on the blessed sun and air, What will ye do for breath? For breath, which was once but a word for life, Is now but a word for death.

Wo for affection! when love must look
On each face it loves with dread—
Kindred and friends—when a few brief hours
And the dearest may be the dead!

The months pass on, and the circle spreads;
And the time is drawing nigh,
When each street may have a darkened house,
Or a coffin passing by.

Our lot is cast upon evil days, In the world's winter-time; The earth is old, and worn with years Of want, of wo, and of crime.

Then out on the folly of ancient times-The folly which wished you mirth: Look round on the anguish, look round on the vice.

Then dare to be glad upon earth!

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

THE ST. SIMONIANS.

LE GLOBE, which is the organ of the new religious sect in France calling themselves St. Simonians, contains, in its late numbers, some curious developments of their principles, and narratives of their proceedings. In many respects, although not in all, the professors of this sect may be compared to the Owenites of England. Their chief doctrines are: - that there should be a universal association; that all social institutions should have for their object the amelioration of the moral, physical, and intellectual condition of the most numerous and the poorest orders; that all the privileges of birth, without exception, should be abolished; and that human beings should be classed according to their capacity, and requited according to their works. Perfect equality of worldly advantages they disclaim as impossible; but they maintain that no one should be permitted to be idle, and that all should contribute, by the labour, either of the hand or of the head, to the general benefit; and they quote and adopt an opinion of Chateaubriand's, "that the time is approaching when it will not be believed that there ever existed a state of society in which one man possessed an income of a million of francs, while another had not wherewithal to purchase a dinner." They deprecate all violent measures; and hold that the only arms which ought to be used are those of persuasion and reasoning. They predict that an end will soon be put to war among nations, and that among individuals crime will, in a great measure, if not entirely, cease. They proclaim the entire equality of the sexes, and declare that the laws by which the happiness of the world is to be henceforth secured, ought to be the joint production of male and female legislators. Several deputations from their body have paid domiciliary visits to some of the principal bankers in Paris, whom they consider as the prime movers of industry, to induce them to apply their funds towards the establishment of La Religion Saint-Simonienne; and the reports of the conversation which took place on those occasions, are very amusing. At one of their recent meetings, a French noble of the name of De Beaufort signified his conversion to the religion, and was received with all the "emotion," and "transports," and "embraces," so common in a French assembly, and which to the less vivacious temperament of Englishmen appear so theatrical and absurd. There can be no doubt that this sect is making great progress. The French minister of war (the Duke of Dalmatia), has addressed a circular letter to the general officers of the army, enjoining them to watch the operations of the St. Simonians, whom he charges with endeavouring to seduce the soldiers from their duty.

DRAMA.

DRURY LANE.

On Wednesday a new musical entertainment was performed for the first time, called My Own Lover. The dramatic portion of the piece is said to be the production of Mr. Rodwell; but whether the music has been selected by the same gentleman, or some other composer, we cannot pretend to say, as, for once, the bills are completely silent on the subject. As to the drama, we have little to remark either for or against it. The scene is laid in Spain (at Salamanca, we believe); and although there is but little that can be dignified by the name of a plot, yet there is a vast variety of situations, which succeed each other with great rapidity, some of which (if not altogether new) are, nevertheless, sufficiently amusing. The great defect appears to be a want of motive for what is done; for, after all the contrivances, disguises, and "hairbreadth 'scapes," we find ourselves at the conclusion utterly unable to comprehend why the characters have given themselves so much trouble,-except, indeed, it be to pass away the necessary time for the performance of a three-act drama. It is the sort of piece, in fact, that an actor would be likely to write; for we have now a scene reminding us of something like it in the Wonder-then a situation like one in the Padlock -and then, again, a third more like still to High Life below Stairs; besides numerous other resemblances too tedious to mention. The principal parts in the acting department were filled by Wallack and Miss Phillips. Wallack was a sort of Don Giovanni; and if he did not display the grace and noble bearing of a Spanish cavalier, was, nevertheless, very animated, and very splendidly dressed. Of Miss Phillips we can speak in terms of approbation also. In Mrs. Gore's comedy she played well, in this piece she does better still; and, with a little more animation thrown into her general deportment, we have good hopes that she will eventually become an excellent comic actress. With respect to dressing, she must have had a wearisome time of it Wednesday, for the author has given her at least half-a-dozen complete changes of costume. Farren had a wretched part, which he did not seem to relish; and Harley, a bustling valet of the Lissardo school, which he played with his accustomed vivacity. The musical portion of the drama fell to the share of Miss Pearson and Mr. Wood. Wood was better than we have seen him for some time past. He gave one or two little ballads with considerable taste, and was much applauded. Of Miss Pearson we forbear, out of gallantry, saying all we could and ought to say. The attempt of some three or four friends of this lady to force a repetition of her songs was (to speak with indulgence) a specimen of very bad taste; and we cannot understand what right the proprietor of a theatre can have to complain of empty houses, when so indifferent an actress as Miss Pearson is put forward in some of the best and most leading characters of the modern stage.

COVENT GARDEN.

WE are happy to announce that Mr. C. Kemble resumed his theatrical duties on Monday night, when he appeared, for the first time since his long illness, in Mercutio. The excellence of his acting in this short, though extremely difficult part, is too well known to require an additional comment. He is much thinner than he was; but he has lost no portion of his judgment or his spirit. Miss Kemble's Juliet was, as usual, highly interesting and impressive; but Mason's Romeo, though a little improved, is yet but a very sorry affair. Catherine of Cleves is announced for Wednesday next. UNREHEARSED STAGE EFFECTS.

Drury Lane, Jan. 2 .- In Richard the Third, King Henry should thus address Tressel.

— but that the whiteness of thy cheek
Is apter than thy tongue to tell thy message.

These lines were thus delivered by Mr. Younge -

--- but that the whiteness of thy tongue Is apter than thy cheek to tell thy message.

Macready, as Richard, from his fall till that of the curtain, puffed like a pair of bellows. + I never saw stage illusion more completely or ludicrously destroyed. I must not forget to mention, that on rushing from the couch, after the dream in the "tent scene," this actor's sleeve, till then tight to the arm, was unaccountably torn open from top to bottom, and his shirt-sleeve having shared the same fate, his bare arm was brandished over the orchestra in extraordinary style. Though this has occurred in exactly the same manner on both nights of his performance of Richard, I still hope I am not wrong in mentioning it as an unrehearsed stage effect. If I am wrong, however, I may at least be amused at the exactly differing modes in which our two great actors conceive that mental agony may be best expressed; for Kean, in one of his impassioned speeches as Othello, tears and unpuckers his sleeve (which is gathered up on the shoulder) down to his wrist. Thus, one conceives that the whirlwind of passion is aided by clothing a bare arm, and the other by baring a clothed

Covent Garden, Jan. 9 .- In the third act of Romeo and Juliet occurred the following scene:

Juliet. It was the nightingale, and not the lark—
Nightly she sings on you pomegranate tree.

A woman in a bounct and shawl emerges from the trees, and proceeds across the stage: at first leisurely, but anon with sudden rapidity. The audience hiss.

Juliet. Believe me, love, it was the nightingale.

Romeo. It was the lark—the herald of the morn—
No nightingale. [The audience titter more.

No nightingale. In the scene wherein Juliet drinks the potion, a most curious effect was produced by Miss Kemble's well-known run and fall. She wore on this night a new dress, which, being made very full, so completely caught the air during her run, that when she threw herself down, it was completely inflated, and rising up all round her (or, in other words, not sinking with her), nothing was seen but a head growing out of a large satin balloon or gigantic pumpkin.

In the dirge scene a particularly fine illusion was produced by the giggling of the Misses Cawse, and many others of the sad sisterhood, while mourning on the solemn occasion; and by the stocks, shirt-collars, and dirty boots of the "bare-necked," "bare-footed" friars.

Mr. Mason, in delivering the speech concerning the apothecary, jumps from the line,

This transposition is worthy of the following, which I heard myself. It was in Shylock's question of Shall I lay perjury upon my soul? &c.
Which, on the occasion I allude to, was thus emphatically given by Elliston:

Shall I lay surgery upon my poll?

No-not for Venice!

I have an equally clear remembrance of hearing Mrs. Charles Kemble exclaim, as Miss Sterling in the Clandertine Marriage, "She has locked the key, and put the down in her pocket." On both these occasions, of course, audience and actors were alike convulsed with laughter.

† As it is not our usage to alter any thing from the correspondents we accept, or the co-operators whom we trust, we can only, as Editor, asy, respecting this "efect," that it is wonderfully excused by the extraordinary exertion with which Macready sustains this character in so masterly a manner from first to last. There is no part on the stage which, so acted, requires so much physical power. "If I am confused or unintelligible," says Garrick in one of his letters, "Impute it to Richard: what an operation!"—Ed. L. G.

Sharp misery had worn him to the hone.

Noting his penury to myself, I said-thus cutting out the whole inventory of his effects (more than half-a-dozen lines)—his "bladders," "pots," "seeds," "cakes of roses," my old friend the "alligator stuffed," &c. &c. &c.

Miss Kemble died so very forward, that the illusion of the final picture was of necessity heightened by a man in a green coat and red breeches of the modern day, rushing into the ancient burying-ground of Verona to push out a descending green curtain, lest it should hurt the corpse! As the footman advanced to the very centre of the stage, where the lady was recumbing, the effect was admirable. (A propes of this curtain, the slit and clout mentioned in my last remain in picturesque statu quo).

At the close of the play, Mr. Egerton said—
"Ladies and gentlemen,—To-morrow evening the juvenile night will take place."

In the fifteenth scene of the pantomime, called "the Nabob's pleasure-grounds," there is a scramble among the characters and some little pigs, which ended on the occasion alluded to, by one of the latter running for refuge into the lowest private stage-box, whereinto, in their efforts to seize it, the clown and the nabob were also precipitated, head over heels, amid shrieks of laughter from all parts of the house.

TABIETTES

Impossible! - In the last No. of the Library of the Fine Arts a curious mistake occurs :. the writer of an article called "Hints to Amateur Artists," speaks of a painter of the name of Cozenss and tells us that, "for several years subsequent to his death, this ingenious artist was afflicted with mental derangement." In this strange situation, for years after his death, he was, it is added, very kindly attended by his friend Dr. Munro! - Vide p. 13.

Burns's Anniversary.—The anniversary of the birth of the great Scottish poet is this year likely to be observed with much éclat; in consequence of the presence of the Ettrick Shepherd in London, and the desire of a number of the friends of Scotland and Scots literature to celebrate the event in an appropriate manner. It is a singular fact, that Hogg's birthday is the same with Burns's-viz. the 25th of Jan. Genius found the one at the plough, and the other at the sheepfold; and both are extraordinary examples of nature triumphing over circumstance. Several of the most popular authors in London are taking an active part in promoting this festival; and though the Scottish nobility and gentry will be among its chief patrons, there can be no doubt but that an ample proportion of English and Irish friends will join them on an occasion which reaches the feelings of all countries. Captain Burns, a son of the bard, is engaged to be of the party; and we most cordially anticipate a day of high convivial and intellectual enjoyment at the Freemason's Tavern, to commemorate the birth of this year, it appears that the number of new books is about 1100, exclusive of new editions, pamphlets, or periodicals; being 50 less than in the year 1830. The number of engravings is 92 (including 50 portraits); 18 of which are engraved in the line manner, 50 mezzotint, 10 chalk, 5 lithograph, 6 aquatint, and 3 etchings. The number of engravings published in 1830 was 107 (including 49 portraits); viz. 23 in line, 57 mezzotint, 10 chalk, 4 lithograph, and 13 aquatint."—Bent's Mon. Lit. Advertiser, &c.

Adelphi of Scottish Poets.

A new Bishop. - One of the Parisian journals, in giving an account of the meeting which lately took place at what it calls the "Kings Arms Tavern, Palace Yard," for the purpose of forming a society for the amelioration of the condition of the people of Ireland, states that the motion to that effect was supported by " Bishop Massey-Dawson !"

Literature and Art .- By a paper just issued containing lists of the new books and principal the other day, while his master was reading the engravings published in London during the past paper, when he suddenly stopped, and with an Longitude... 51° 37′ 32″ N. Longitude... 0 3 51 W. of Greenwich.

King's Theatre.—It is now stated that the mirited lessee of the King's Theatre has completed all his dramatic arrangements, and is to open on this day fortnight. A programme, which has been promulgated, promises great novelty, at least, both in pieces and performers.

Travels in Ithaca. - A traveller who has recently visited a part of Greece, gives some interesting details respecting the isle of Ithaca. formerly the kingdom of Ulysses. Vathe, the capital, is situated in the most picturesque spot, surrounded by an amphitheatre of rocks, which form a small bay sheltered on all sides. The form a small bay shettered on an aloas. The entrance to the bay is so narrow, and the rocks so close together, that it might be taken for a circular lake. The town follows the curve of the foot of the rocks, and extends to the sea, which washes the foundations of the houses. or is kept off by a stone parapet, erected to hinder it from flowing into the principal streets. The very curious antiquities with which the island abounds are the objects which chiefly attract the notice of the traveller. The principal are the palace of Ulysses, near the bay of Aito; the gardens of Laertes, still admired for their fer-tility; the rock of Homer, near the village of Exorii: the fountain of Arethusa. &c. &c.

Journals. - The newspaper price current published by the royal Prussian newspaperoffice at Berlin, contains a list of 667 German 177 French, 72 English, 29 Italian, 28 Dutch, 15 Polish, 11 Russian-German, 6 Danish, 5 Swedish, 3 Hungarian, 2 Bohemian, 1 Spanish, 1 Latin, and 1 modern Greek; in all 1013 newspapers, literary journals, advertisers, and mercantile papers; and to every number a note is added, stating how often the journal is published, of how many sheets it consists, what the postage amounts to, and what is the whole cost. By the publication of this list, which is in every respect very interesting, the Prussian government gives a manifest proof of its desire to encourage the communication and propagation of knowledge.

Dublin Zoological Society. - We were glad to see by the report in our last No., that the Zoological Society here had communicated some of its duplicates to the fellow Society of Dublin, as it will at least redeem it from an anecdote, which afforded a curious idea of the merits of Irish zoology. Our Hibernian brethren are sometimes represented as a little addicted to boasting, and an instance is given of one, speaking of this Institution, who declared, " By my soul, the Dublin Zoological is quite equal to the London, only there are no animal bastes in it yet!"

The New Peers ._. " The King has at length consented to make a numerous batch of peers. said some one the other day at table. destroy the whole body of the peerage," observed another. "I do not think so," remarked a third; " for they will make up in quantity what they want in quality."

Death.

EARLY in the Season Mr. BROSTER purposes resuming Instructions in his original System (vide Blackwood's Magazine, Jan. 1825), for removing all Im pediments of Speech.

In the course of Mr. B.'s experience in above three hundred cases, he has been enabled to discover an entirely new Nystem of Elecution—not founded on she hitherte usual art, but on the more powerful principles of Nature; restoring the organs of Speech, however weak, so as to avoid, and compisely evercome, the fatigues attendant on the duties of the Church, or the labours of the Bar, in extempore speaking.

So much has this System been approved by his friends and those distinguished members of society to whom it has been communicated, as to call forth their unqualified permission of reference; at the request of several of whom, this communication is inserted. For further particulars at present, inquire of Mr. T. Broster, Burgeon, 17, Queen's Buildings, Brompton; or to Mr. Broster, Brook Lodge, near Chester.

OPINIONS OF THE PUBLIC JOURNALS.

- "The ntility of this valuable volume almost eclipses its beauty, in our estimation. It is so beautifully executed in the details of the engrating—it is so on metes—it presents so much information is many the engrating—it is no ometes—it presents so much information is many respected into a small a compass, and is presented to the public at a price so wondrously low,—that we know not how we can better express our opinion of the many claims the volume puts forth, than by assuring our readers, that, were we limited in our choice to the purchase of one Annual out of the multitude, this should be that one in preference to all the rest. It is an oranment for the bouldoir or the drawing-room, while it is an absolute necessary for the study. The book ought to find a niche wherever there is a person to read a book. It is quite a little idol book to us."—Altas.

- book. It is quite a little ion book to us. Annus.

 "This beautiful and most useful little volume—a perfect picture of elegance—contains a vast sum of geographical information. A more instructive present, or a gift better calculated be long preserved, and often referred to, could not be offered to favoured youth of either sex."—Literary Gazette.
- "Of all the Annuals, this is anguestionably the most useful, perhaps the most agreeable, and in many cases it will doubtless prove the most selection. It is one of the most delightful valuable book selection be given or received, at a season of the valuable book make a present becomes a sort of duty." New Monthly Magazint.
- "It far aurpasses any thing of the kind which we have seen, an is made to suit the popular libraries which Dr. Lardner and M Murray are now sending into every family in the empire." Monthly Review.
- "This is a gem of no small brilliancy. Its very ingenious method of arrangement secures to the geographical student the information for which hitherto he has been obliged to resort to works of the largest dimensions."—Atheneum.
- "The workmanship is among the best of the kind we have ver witnessed."—Examiner.
- "It contains all the information to be derived from the most xpensive and unwieldy atlas."—York Courant.
- "By a moment's reference, the exact situation of any place may found."—Birmingham Journal.
- "An excellent little work, engraved with a clearness and cor-ectness which is quite aurprising. Travellers have a system of cography and a complete atlas, which they may carry in their ocket."—Spectator.
- " It is the most perfect gem which has ever been published."— Bristol Journal.
- "We strongly recommend it to our literary friends."-Brighton
- "The plates are executed with extraordinary neatness, clear-ness, and precision."—Belle Assemblée.
 "It embodies in a small compass, and in the most elegant form, a vast mass of geographical information."—Family Magazine.
- "It affords facilities of reference not to be found in maps of a rger kind."—Edinburgh Literary Journal.
- "It stands alone and unrivalled; and, as far as depends on merit and talent, its success cannot be for a moment doubtful."— Windsor Express.
- "This is one of the most useful publications that have distin-ruished this improving age. It is beautifully executed, and may ruly be designated a gem of art."—Bath Journal.
- "Highly useful, both as a distinct work and as an elegant illus-rative companion to such books as the Family Library, &c. The lates are most beautifully engraved."—Preston Chronicle.
- "One of the most elegant productions we ever saw. The exe-cution is so skilful, that, together with those of portability and cheapness, the work possesses all the other and more important advantages to be found in maps of larger dimensions."—Preton
- "This is a publication of the greatest utility."-Devon Tele graph.
- "Singularly felicitous in design, and truly exquisite in point of execution, this is the most perfect gem which has ever been pub-lished."—Bristol Journal.

- "We have rarely seen such a combination of beauty, accuracy and simplicity, as these plates evince."—News.
- "This is indeed a beautiful work—a perfect chef-d'envre, and destined, we are sure, to receive the most extensive patronage."—Carlisle Patriof.
- "It is no less creditable to the proprietors in point of originality of design, than to the artist for the unrivalled beauty of it execution. The clearness and elegance of the engravings have a property of the kind."—Morning Advertiser.
- " It is truly perfect and beautiful."-Bath Herald.
- "The work is entitled to the highest praise."- Nottingham
- "This is truly a most elegant production. To be admired and approved of, it needs only to be seen and examined."—Birmingham Journal.
- "It is very convenient for quick and easy reference."—Dublis Literary Gazette.
- "We have not seen any thing more deserving of general appro-ation than this little publication."—Tyne Mercury.
- "The design is a good one, and the scale on which it has been prepared extremely convenient for reference.".—Brighton Gasette.

- "This is decidedly a clever and useful publication."-Kentish
- "This interesting little work contains, on a small scale, all the most useful information of large and expensive general atlases."— Sherbourne Mercury.
- "A work as useful as it is beautiful."-Taunton Courier.
- "Nothing could be devised better calculated to impress upon the mind a knowledge of the general principles of geography, than the plan of this publication."—The Warder.
- "It will be a crying shame in this age of intellect, if this able and beautiful work be not extensively patronised; but we cannot doubt the success which we feel assured its intrinsic merits must secure to it."—Intelligence.
- "It is scarcely in the nature of things, that a work of so much public service should fail in meeting with that extensive pa-tronage which can alone remunerate the projectors."—Leeds In-telligencer.
- "The plates are beautifully executed; and the geographistudent may obtain in this little work, such is the excellence its arrangement, as much information as he could gain by wad through several books of far greater bulk."—Weekly Dispatch.
- "We have seldom aren a work so perfect in its arrangement and so elegant in its execution."—York Courant.
- "For the accuracy of its delineation, and the extent of the in-ormation which it conveys, it stands without a rival in English opography."—Freeman's Journal.
- "The plan of this useful and elegant work may, indeed, be called original. The style and execution of the maps is of the first character."—Exeter Gazette.
- "This work is one of the most useful publications which has yet issued from the press; it is a unique and brilliant accession to the library, and a very useful work to the student in geography."—Oxford Gazette.

BIBLICAL CABINET ATLAS,
Containing finely executed Engravings from Steel of all the Tribes and Countries mentioned in Sacred History; with a New General Indea, exhibiting, at one view, all that is geographically and historically interesting in the Holy Scriptures.

"This beautiful publication is executed in a style of engraving beyond which, we suppose, art cannot go. It is the more acceptable, as charts of the countries mentioned in the Hible have thinher to been either very incorrect, or, if well executed, inaccessible to the public, on account of their enormous prices."—Monthly Review.

"We are pleased to add our most unequivocal commendation of this very useful publication. In point of execution the maps are nothing inferior, if they are not superior, to their predecessors; and the correctness does infinite credit to the diligence and research of Mr. Starling and his literary associates."—Caristian Remembrances.

Remembrancer.

"The present is a very excellent addition, and is a desideratum in families."—Speciator.

"The Indica will afford a large body of information for the general reader, and must be of great value and interest, as well to the historical as the biblical student."—Carriste Patriot.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

Observations on the Mussulmauns of India, &c. &c. By Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali. 8vo. London, 1832. Parbury and Co. THERE is none of the trade of authorship in this publication. The writer seems to have given Christian faith and herself to a true be-liever in Mahomet; and thus to have had access to many familiar eastern scenes, to which male travellers and historians would aspire at their peril. In these, praised be the petticoat, she is admirable; and therefore, without a word of the well-known tragedy of Hassan and Hosein, and the public observances in memory thereof, we will go at once into the private apartment of the less obvious disciples of the She-ah Mahometans.

" The ladies celebrate the returning season of Mahurrum with as much spirit and zeal as the confinement in which they exist can possibly admit of. There are but few, and those chiefly princesses, who have emaum-baarahs at command within the boundary of the zeenahnah: the largest and best apartment in their establishment is therefore selected for the purpose of an emaum-baarah, into which none but females are admitted, excepting the husband, father, son, or brother of the lady, who, having on this occasion full liberty to invite her female acquaintance, those who are her nearest male relatives even are not admitted until previous notice is given, in order that the female guests may secrete themselves from the sight of these relatives of their hostess. In commemorating this remarkable event in Mussulmaun history, the expressions of grief manifested by the ladies are far greater, and appear to me more lasting, than with the other sex; indeed, I never could have given credit to the extent of their bewailings, without witnessing, as I have done for many years, the season for tears and profound grief return with the month of Ma-In sorrowing for the martyred emaums, they seem to forget their private griefs: the bereavement of a beloved object even is almost overlooked in the dutiful remembrance of Hasan and Hosein at this period; and I have had opportunities of observing this triumph of religious feeling in women who are remarkable for their affectionate attachment to their children, husbands, and parents. They tell me, 'We must not indulge selfish sorrows of our own, whilst the prophet's family alone have a right to our tears.' The religious zeal of these people is evinced, likewise, in a stern, systematic line of privations during the period of Mahurrum. No one is obliged by any law or command: it is voluntary abstinence on the part of each individual: they impose it on themselves, out of pure pity and respect for their emaums' well-remembered sufferings. Every thing which constitutes comfort, luxury, or even convenience, at other times, on these occasions are rigidly laid aside. The pallungh and the charpoy, (the two descriptions of bedsteads in general use), on which scriptions of bedsteads in general use), on which about the person; the coloured pyjasmahs and cine, to go from home, to give away or secept the females love to lounge for some hours in deputtahs are removed, with every other article a gift, or any other action which hamses reason standings, and, in lieu of this comfort, they take their rest on a common date mat, on the floor. The musnud, and all its cushioned luxuries, give place, on this occasion, to the simply matted floor. The indulgence in choice dainties, at other times so necessary to their happiness, is now foregone, and their meal limited, throughout Mahurrum, to the coarsest food, such as barley-bread, rice and peas boiled together (called kutcher), without even the usual additions to make it palatable ketcherie, as ghee, salt, pepper, and spices; these ingredients being considered by the zealous females too indulgent and luxurious for humble mourners during Mahurrum. The pawn leaf, another luxury of no small moment to Asiatic tastes, is now banished for the ten days' mourning. A very poor substitute has been adopted, in the mixture described at the gentleman's assembly; it is called goattur. The truth is, their health would suffer from any long disuse of tobaccoleaf, lime, and a bitter gum, which are in general use with the pawn. The latter is of a ral use with the pawn. warm aromatic nature, and imparts a fine flavour to the other ingredients; but as it is considered a great indulgence to eat pawn, they abstain from it altogether during Mahurrum. The mixture, they say, is only allowed for health's sake. When visitors call on the Mussulmaun ladies at Mahurrum, the guattur is presented on trays, accompanied by bags neatly embroidered in silver and gold, of many different shapes and patterns, mostly their own work and invention: they are called buttooah and jhaumdanies. The variety of ornaments, which constitute the great delight of all classes of females in India, are entirely laid aside, from the first hour of Mahurrum until the period for mourning concludes. I never heard of any people so thoroughly attached to orna-ments as the females of India are generally. They are indulged in this foible—pardonable it may be-by their husbands and parents. The wealthiness of a family may often be judged by a single glance at the principal lady of the zeenahnah, who seldom omits doing honour to her husband by a full display of the precious metals, with a great variety of gems or jewels, on ordinary occasions. The men, of all ranks, are proud of their wives' finery; even the poorest hold in derision all ornament that is not composed of sterling metal, of which they seem excellent judges. The massy chains of gold or silver, the solid bangles for the arms and ancles, the nut (nose-ring) of gold wire, on which is strung a ruby between two pearls, worn only by married women; the joshun (armlet), of silver or gold, often set with precious stones; the many rings for the fingers, thumbs, and toes, form the daily dress of a lady. But I must not digress further. These are all removed from the person as soon as the moon is seen, when the first day of Mahurrum commences; the hair is unloosed from its usual confinement, and allowed to flow in disorder Begum, to eat, to drink, to sleep, to take medi-

the day and night, are removed from their of their usual costume, for a suit that, with them, constitutes mourning. Some choose black, others gray, slate, or green, and the widow wears white from the day her husband dies. A widow never alters her style of dress; neither does she wear a single ornament during her widowhood, which generally lasts with her life. I never heard of one single instance, during my twelve years' residence amongst them, of a widow marrying again. They have no law to prohibit it; and I have known some ladies, whose affianced husbands died before the marriage was concluded, who preferred a life of solitude and prayer, although many other over-tures were made. Many of the rigidly zealous among the females mortify themselves by wearing their suit of mourning during the ten days, without changing. The dress is worn next the skin, and, in very warm weather, must be comfortless after the first day: but so it is; and so many are the varieties of selfinflicted privations at this period, that my letter might be filled with the observations I have made. I cannot, however, omit to mention my old woman-servant (ayah), whose mode of abstinence, in remembrance of Hosein, is rigidly severe. My influence does not prevail in dissuading her, although I fear the consequences to her health will be seriously felt if she persist in the fulfilment of her self-imposed trial. This poor old creature resolves on not allowing one drop of water, or any liquid, to pass her lips during the ten days' mourning; as she says, her emaum, Hosein, and his family, suffered from thirst at Kraabaallah, why should such a creature as she is be indulged with water? This shews the temper of the people generally; my ayah is a very ignorant old woman, yet she respects her emaum's memory."

The whole account of these Mahometan ceremonies is interesting, though the processions, &c. are less curious than the female interior observances. The annexed paints an effect of the superstition.

"The Najoomee are men generally with some learning, who, for their supposed skill in astrology, have, in all ages since Mahumud's death, been more or less courted and venerated by the Mussulmaun people ;-I should say, with those who have not the fear of God stronger in their hearts than the love of the world and its vanities; -the really religious people discountenance the whole system and pretended art of the astrologer. It is wonderful the influence a Najoom acquires in the houses of many great men in India;—wher-ever one of these idlers is entertained, he is the oracle to be consulted on all occasions, whether the required solution be of the utmost importance, or the merest trifling subject. I know those who submit, with a childlike docility, to the Najoom's opinion, when their better reason, if allowed to sway, would decide against the astrologer's prediction. If Najoom says it is not proper for Nuwanb Schib, or his is the best guide to decide upon, Najoom has said it, and Najoom must be right. Najoom can make peace or war, in the family he overrules, at his pleasure; and many are the houses divided against themselves by the wicked influence of a bad man, thus exercising his crafty wiles over the weakness of his credulous master."

Connected with the foregoing, though of a musical tenour.

"Amongst the many varieties of native musical instruments I have seen in India, the kettle-drum is the most simple and singular, which I will take the liberty of describing :way, and very similar in shape to those of the Royal Horse Guards. A globe of the common size, divided into exact halves, would be about the dimension and shape of a pair of Indian manufacture; the parchment is strained over the open mouth, with a thin hoop to fix it firm; the slightest pressure with the fingers on this hoop draws it into tune. The simplicity of this accompaniment to the human voice, when touched by the fingers, very much in the way Europeans use the tambourine, is only to be appreciated by those who have been long acquainted with the sound. The only time when it is beaten with sticks is when used as dunkahs, before the king and queen, on their appearing in public—a sort of alarum to warn obstructing hackeries, or carriages, to move out of the way. I have occasionally observed a singular mode of imitating the sound of cavalry going over hard ground, adopted in the processions of great men on the tenth of Mahurrum; the contrivance is called chuckee, and composed of ebony, or some equally hard wood, the shape and size of a pocket globe, divided into halves; each person, having the pair, beats them with a particular tact on the flat surface, so as to produce the desired sound of horses galloping: and where from fifty to a hundred men, or more, are engaged in this performance, the resemblance may be easily couceived."

Another Mahometan picture has some new traits.

"When a death occurs in a Mussulmaun family, the survivor provides dinners on the third, seventh, and fortieth days succeeding, in memory of the deceased person; these dinners are sent in trays to the immediate relatives and friends of the party,-on which sacred occasion all the poor and the beggars are sought to share the rich food provided. The like customs are observed for Hosein every year. The third day offering is chiefly composed of sugar, ghee, and flour, and called meettah; it is of the consistence of our rice-puddings; and, whether the dainty is sent to a king or a beggar, there is but one style in the presentationall is served in the common brown earthen dish, in imitation of the humility of Hosein and his family, who seldom used any other in their domestic circle. The dishes of meettah are accompanied with the many varieties of bread common to Hindoostaun, without leaven, as sheah-maul, bacherkaunie, chapaatie, &c.; the first two have milk and ghee mixed with the flour, and nearly resemble our pie-crust. I must here stay to remark one custom I have observed amongst natives-they never cook food whilst a dead body remains in the house: as soon as it is known amongst a circle of friends that a person is dead, ready-dressed dinners are forwarded to the house for themno one fancying he is conferring a kindness, but fulfilling a duty. The third day after the teeth have not yet been introduced into conversation, shrewd in their remarks, and accomplishment of the Mahurrum ceremomies native families, nor is it ever likely they will, their language is both correct and refined.

off, and preparations commence at an early hour in the morning for bathing and replacing the banished ornaments. Abstinence and privation being no longer deemed meritorious by the Mussulmauns, the pawn-the dear delightful pawn, which constitutes the greatest possible luxury to the natives—pours in from the bazaar, to gladden the eye and rejoice the they are the most particular people living in heart of all classes, who after this temporary this respect, as they never eat or drink without self-denial enjoy the luxury with increased zest. Again the missee (a preparation of antimony) is applied to the lips, the gums, and occasion-It is of well-baked earth, moulded in the usual ally to the teeth of every married lady, who branch of a tree or shrub-as the pomegranate, emulate each other in the rich black produced; the neem, babool, &c. The fresh-broken twig such is the difference of taste as regards beauty is bruised and made pliant at the extremity, females of Hindoostaun nature is defaced by with this the men preserve the enamelled-lookis penciled afresh with prepared black, called kaarjil; the chief ingredient in this prepara-tion is lamp-black. The eyebrow is well exa-nuity. mined for fear an ill-shaped hair should impair the symmetry of that arch esteemed a beauty in every clime, though all do not, perhaps, exercise an equal care with eastern dames to preserve order in its growth. The mayndhie is again applied to the hands and feet which restores the bright red hue deemed so becoming and healthy. The nose once more is destined to receive the nutt (ring) which designates the married lady; this ring, I have before mentioned, is of gold wire, the pearls and ruby between them are of great value, and I have seen many ladies wear the nutt as large in circumference as the bangle on her wrist, though of course much lighter; it is often worn so large, that at meals they are obliged to hold it apart from the face with the left hand whilst conveying food to the mouth with the other. This nutt, however, from ancient custom, is indispensable with married women; and though they may find it disagreeable and inconvenient, it cannot possibly be removed, except for Mahurrum, from the day of their marriage until their death or widowhood, without infringing on the originality of their customs, in adhering The ears to which they take so much pride. of the females are pierced in many places; the gold or silver rings return to their several stations after Mahurrum, forming a broad fringe of the precious metals on each side the head; but when they dress for great events-as paying visits or receiving company - these give place to strings of pearls and emeralds, which fall in rows from the upper part of the ear to the shoulder, in a graceful, elegant style. My ayah, a very plain old woman, has no less than ten silver rings in one ear and nine in the other, each of them having pendant ornaments; indeed, her ears are literally fringed with silver. After the hair has undergone all the ceremonies of washing, drying, and anointing with the sweet jasmine oil of India, it is drawn with great precision from the forehead to the back, where it is twisted into a queue which generally reaches below the waist; the ends are finished with strips of red silk and silver ribands entwined with the hair, and terminating with a good-sized rosette. The hair is jet black, without a single variation of tinge, and luxuriantly long and thick, and thus dressed remains for the week-about the usual interval between their laborious process of bathing; nor can they conceive the comfort other people find in frequent brushing and combing the hair. Brushes for the head and gifted with good sense and politeness, foud of the teeth have not yet been introduced into conversation, shrewd in their remarks, and is a busy time with the inmates of zeenahnahs, | unless some other material than pigs' bristles when generally the mourning garb is thrown can be rendered available by the manufacturers for the present purposes of brushes. The swine is altogether considered abominable to Mussulmauns; and such is their detestation of the unclean animal, that the most angry epithet from a master to a slave would be to call him 'seur!' (swine). It must not, however, be supposed that the natives neglect their teeth; washing their mouths before and after meals; and as a substitute for our tooth-brush, they make a new one every day from the tender where we admire the coral hue, with the after the bark or rind is stripped from it, and the application of black dye. The eyelid also ing white teeth which excite the admiration of strangers, and which, though often envied, I

> "The ladies never wear stockings, and only cover the feet with shoes when pacing across their court-yard, which bounds their view and their walks. Nevertheless, there is a fashion and taste about the ladies' shoes, which is productive of much emulation in zeenahnah life; they are splendidly worked in many patterns, with gold and silver spangles, variously-coloured small seed beads and embroidery - the whole one mass of glittering metal; they are made with sharp points curling upwards, some nearly reaching half way to the knees, and always worn down at the heel, as dressing slippers; the least costly, for their every-day wear, are of gold embroidery on velvet; the less opulent condescend to wear tinsel work; and the meanest servants yellow or red cloth with silver binding. The same style of shoes are worn by the males as by the females; I have seen some young men with green shagreen slippers for the rainy season; these are made with a high heel, and look unseemly. The fashion of shoes varies with the times in this country, as well as in others; sometimes it is genteel to have small points to the shoes; at another, the points are long and much curled; but they still retain the preference for pointed shoes, what-ever be the fashion adopted. The greatest novelty in the way of shoes, which came under my observation in India, was a pair of silver embroidery, small pointed, and very neatly made: on the points and round the instep small silver bells were fastened, which produced harmony with every step, varied by the quick or more gentle paces of the wearer; these were a present to me from a lady of distinction in Oude. Upon visiting this lady on one occasion, my black silk slippers, which I had left at the entrance (as is the custom here), had most likely attracted the curiosity of the Begum's slaves, for when that lady attended me to the threshold, they could no where be found; and I was in danger of being obliged to soil my stockings by walking shoeless to my palkie, across the court-yard. In this dilemma the lady proffered me the pair here described; I was much amused with the novelty of the exchange, upon stepping into the musical shoes, which, however they may be prized by native ladies, did not exactly suit my style of dress, nor convenience in walking, although I must always remember the Begum's attention with gratitude. The ladies' society is by no means insipid or without interest; they are naturally

This, at first, was an enigma to me, considering that their lives are spent in seclusion, and that their education was not conducted on European principles; the mystery, however, has passed away upon an intimate acquaintance with the domestic habits of the people. The men with whom genteel women converse are generally well educated, and from the naturally inquisitive disposition of the females. not a word escapes the lips of a father, husband, or brother, without an inquiry as to its meaning, which having once ascertained, is never forgotten, because their attention is not diverted by a variety of pursuits, or vain amusements. The women look up to the opinions of their male relatives with the same respect as children of other climes are accustomed to regard their tutor or governess, considering every word pronounced as worthy of imitation, and every sentiment expressed as a guide to their own. Thus the habit of speaking correctly is so familiar to the females of Mussulmann society, that even women servants, long accustomed to serve in zeenahnahs, may be readily distinguished by their language from the same class of people in attendance on European ladies."

We trust our readers will be (as we have been) attracted by these portions of a very attractive work, to which we shall turn with a weekly alacrity.

Sir Ralph Esher; or, Adventures of a Gentleman of the Court of Charles II. 3 vols. London, 1832. Colburn and Bentley.

WE candidly confess, we are willing to say as little as possible about Sir Ralph Esher. know that praise undeserved is satire, not service; and we do not think that any opinion of ours could persuade the public that the intricate and wire-drawn parrative of Sir Ralph Esher is an interesting story, or that it embodies aught of the wit and gaiety supposed to belong to the time in which the scene is laid. We think that Mr. Leigh Hunt's forte lies rather in the simple and the pathetic; and the following episode of the plague is in his best style.

"A young merchant in the city was seized with the symptoms of the disorder, just as the day had been fixed which was to unite him with his mistress. Some difficulties had been thrown in the way of the union by a crabbed guardian; and many hours had not elapsed from their removal, and every thing been settled (which the lover hastened to see done with the greatest it. In vain he spoke as loudly as he could, and impatience), when the terrible spots appeared that were to cut him off from communion with the uninfected. It is supposed, that the obstacles in the first instance, and the hurry afterwards, threw his blood into a ferment, which exasperated the attack. He wished to make light of the matter, and to go about his ordinary concerns; but the strangeness of his sensations, and the thought of the peril that he might bring to his mistress, soon made him give up this pretension. He said, that his horror at first inclined him to cry aloud, to tear his hair, and dash himself against the wall of the room; but the thoughts of her again controlled him, and he resolved to go through every thing as patiently as might be, lest he should add to his chances of losing her. He sent her a message to that effect, bidding her be of good heart; and then, in a passion of tears, which he resolved should be his last, but which, he said, seemed to give him a wonderful kind of humble support, betook himself to his dear servant, and your nurse.' Their eyes him; but as he did not sleep, and the good that 'they should at all events live there.' woman, observing him tranquil, slept a great deal, he thought next day he might as well rise and go into the garden for a little air. The garden, though in the city, was a very pretty one, and as it abutted on some grounds, belonging on one side to a church, and on the other to a field where they shot at butts, was removed both from sight and noise, and might be called even solitary. He found himself alarmingly weak; and the air, instead of relieving, seemed to bring the weight of an oven with it; but there was grass and roses; and he thought it would add to the grace of his memory with her he loved, if he died in so sweet a spot, rather than in the house. Besides, he could not bear to think of dving in what, he hoped, would have been his bridal bed. These reflections made him again shed tears in spite of himself, and he lay down on a bench under a tree, wishing he could melt away in that tender despair. The young gentleman guessed that he had lain in this way a good hour, during which he had a sleep that a little refreshed him, when he heard himself called by his name. He thought it was the nurse, and looked towards the house, but saw nobody. The name was repeated twice, the last time with the addition of an epithet of tenderness, which he knew could come from no such person. His heart began to beat; and his ear guiding him truly to the voice, which he now recognised, he saw, on the top of the wall nearly opposite him, and under a tree which overhung it from the outside, his beloved mistress, holding with one hand on a bough, and with the other supporting herself in the posture of one who intended to come down. 'Oh, Richard!' said she, 'what a blessing to find you here, and nobody to hinder me! I have cheated them. and slunk away - my love! my life!' Our lover said, these last little words had a wonderful effect on him. With all her tenderness, his betrothed bride had never yet indulged it so far as to utter such 'conjugal' words (that was his phrase). He said, they seemed to give her a right to join him; and they filled him with such love and gratitude, that the very languor of his illness became confounded with a bewitching pleasure. He confessed, that the dread of her being infected, though it still recurred to him, was much fainter than before. However, he the more thought it was his duty to urge it, and did so. But the lady had no such dread. She had come on purpose to brave rose up and began to drag his steps towards her; in vain he made signs to her not to descend. 'Dearest Richard,' said she, 'if you cannot help me down, it is but an easy jump, and do you think any thing will induce me to go back? I am come to nurse you, and make you happy.' 'You will die,' said the lover in a faint voice, now arrived within hearing, and still making signs of refusal. 'Oh no: Heaven will bless us,' cried she: 'I will not go back, mark me; I will not indeed; I cannot, much less now I have seen you, and in that sick gown. But I see you cannot help me down. You are unable. Therefore I come.' With these words she made the jump, and the next minute was supporting him in her arms. put her arms round him, and took his repelling hand into hers, and, raising herself, kissed him on the mouth, saying, ' Now I belong to you. Let me seat you on the bench, and get you some drink. I am your wife now, and your

Not being able to reach the bench, he sat down in a thicket of roses. The young lady went to get him some drink, and returned with the news that she had waked the astonished nurse, and sent her to tell her guardian where she was. Nobody expected him to venture to come and fetch her, and he did not. He told the gentleman who had these particulars from him, that this behaviour of his betrothed bride, put him in a state so new and transporting, that he conceived an alteration of his blood must have taken place very speedily after her return from the house; for though he could hardly bear his delight, he began manifestly to get better within an hour afterwards. The lady never received the infection. Their friends said she would. and that two would die instead of one. The physician prophesied otherwise. Neither the lover nor his mistress, however, would quit their retreat, till all doubt of the possibility of infecting others was more than done away. In the course of six weeks they were man and wife; and my acquaintance told me, not as many days ago, that they were still living, and a pattern of love and esteem." We now gladly turn from the book to its author, of whom we are fain to speak a kind word. Mr. Leigh Hunt is a man whose time and whose talents have for a length of years been devoted to the public: in whatever light his opinions may be viewed, no one can deny that they were steadfastly maintained through good and evil report. He is (though, as a whole, we dislike the school) the writer of some most sweet and graceful poetry, which has given pleasure to very many; his essays are often delightful; and the Tatler, a little daily paper he now edits, contains clever dramatic criticisms. We believe, too, that Mr. Leigh Hunt is not in flourishing circumstances - literature is a very precarious lottery; and surely one who has so earnestly pursued it, both as a pleasure and a profession, deserves something from the memory of the public. What is the business of every one, is too often the business of none; but we must venture to express a hope, that an age which prides itself on its appreciation and ready reward of talent, will not allow a gifted and an amiable man to discover that its gratitude is passive, not active.

Time's Telescope for 1832; or, a complete Guide to the Almanao. 12mo. pp. 388. London, Sherwood and Co.

THREE weeks after Christmas, and we have only been able to tell our readers, in a note, how very clever and excellent a publication is again presented to them, under the annual title of Time's Telescope, enriched by Mr. Rennie's Notes of a Naturalist, containing much intelligence in a very entertaining form; and the astronomical portion from the pen of Mr. J. T. Barker-one of the most industrious and successful observers of the heavens in the present day; - sufficient to stamp this book with a high degree of interest. The latter contains a guide to the heavens, which no youthful astronomer should be without, and which even those advanced in the science might read with pleasure, and find useful for reference. The astronomical division of the volume also concentrates the celestial occurrences of 1832, the particulars of which here combined, are otherwise inaccessible without a reference to the British, French, and German ephemerides.

Independently of the great merits which we prayers, and so to his bed. He was soon left were filled with tears, and the lover could only have just pointed out, we ought to mention the alone with none but an old nurse to attend lift his head towards heaven, as much as to say, Almanac as extremely correct and satisfactory; have just pointed out, we ought to mention the Repository) very much the reverse: neither has the publisher spared any cost upon the embellishments; and, with a few miscellaneous extracts as a sample of the whole, we can as justly as cordially speak of the volume as one emiand interesting to all ages. The following is striking-we might say sublime :-

"To acquire a correct idea of magnitude, we must ascend some elevation, from whence a horizon; here would be displayed an extent of forming a circle eighty miles in diameter, consequently one hundred and fifty in circumference, and an area of five thousand square miles. This, then, would be one of the largest objects that the eye could grasp at one time; but, large as it is, it would require forty thousand such prospects to constitute the whole surface of the earth; but this is comparatively nothing; for one of those glittering points which ornament the celestial canopy (Jupiter), is fourteen thousand times larger than the earth, and the sun 1,384,480 times larger than our terrestrial globe! Here, then, the imagination begins to be overpowered at an early step of the comparison; for there are, it is probable, an hundred million of such bodies as the sun within the scope of modern instruments, each individual of which may be as vast as our solar orb; and if all of these were congregated into one mass, it would probably be but as nothing when compared with the material creation that lies beyond the reach of human research.

"Intimately connected with the idea of magnitude is that of space-space, the theatre of astronomical science. When the midnight sky is refined by frost, the deep azure canopy is seen to be thronged with glittering points, which we call stars. It is admitted that these are at an immense distance; for were we to travel in the direction towards which they lie, they would not increase their apparent magnitude, which is the case with those objects which we approach on the earth's surface. The diameter of the earth, therefore, is too small a scale with which to measure their distances; the diameter of the earth's orbit also fails in accomplishing the desired object. This amazing length of line (190 millions of miles) fails to increase or diminish their visual angle, or alter their relative positions to each other. Without availing ourselves of every step which reason and science afford, it will be readily admitted that space lies far beyond where the faintest star-beam may be supposed to indicate the verge of creation. To aid, however, the contemplation, the nature of extension may be considered-mere extension; the distance of two bodies from each other; the path along which a body moves; but the path described by a moving body in a right line, has only length; space has also breadth and thickness, which latter may be called a solid space; keeping the mind intent on the figure thus supposed, let it be conceived, if possible, of an infinite extension in the three dimensions: of the infinite flowing of a line each way: an infinite extension of a superficies; an infinite radiation of a cube; but the mind falters in attempting to fathom this profound abyss. Let there be described the largest circle that imagination can conceive, and a tangent be drawn to this vast circle, and extended till the powers which we are the more inclined to notice, from | bounded, and thought invigorated may renew finding our usual pocket-book (Peacock's Polite the task; but millions and millions of years may the swiftest wing urge on its vigorous unwearied flight in one direction,-it may ascend, descend, and describe a course, making all pos sible angles with its previous directions, and still be as distant from a boundary as at the nently calculated to be beneficial to the young, first. Two bodies might travel millions of ages with exceeding velocity towards each other, and in the same right line, and never meet. Words and numbers fail, or we might call in the aid of the ages that have rolled on prospect might be obtained of an uninterrupted to the present moment, and those which the vast ocean of futurity contains, and assist the view, stretching forty miles in every direction, ideal flight with the swiftness of sun-beams or of seraphs; but no human fancy can summon up an adequate conception to rove through this mighty abyss, where, above, beneath, around, all is interminable ocean, shoreless, bottomless:

At once it quite ingulfs all human thought; 'Tis comprehension's absolute defeat!

This wondrous space is replenished with rolling orbs of diversified forms, magnitudes, and constitutions. Is it not more easy to conceive that these glorious bodies are infinite in their number, and interminably dispersed over the fields of space, than that they are placed in a void which bounds the amplitude of creation? Let it, however, be supposed that there is a termination, and that a circle can be described and generated which would include the whole of material existence; and that this spherical universe is as vast as the imagination can grasp by either numbers or geometry—let the rein of fancy be given to the most vigorous mind in calculating the sum total of these suns, firmaments of suns, systems of systems of sunslet the toil of computation be renewed year after year, with the aid of the whole human race, and a continuation of the task be left as a legacy to posterity, to estimate the grand amount. this imaginary calculation of the suns of the universe, it should be borne in mind that all are arranged in clusters; and that each cluster is as distant from each other in the same proportion as two individual stars in a cluster may be from one another. The system of fixed stars to which our sun belongs is the Via Lactea, the extent of which is at least nine hundred times the distance of the nearest fixed star from our central orb-so distant is the extreme boundary of our cluster or nebula, that the light of a star, placed at its farthest verge, though it travel with the velocity of twelve millions of miles every minute, would take up three thousand years to reach the earth! The telescope has discovered thousands of these clusters of stars; from those that are distinctly seen and of considerable extent, to those that are barely visible under the most favourable circumstances of atmosphere, and with the most powerful instruments. In estimating the number contained in this limited universe, when ages had rolled over ages, it is evident a boundary would be approximated; for on the principle that matter is not infinitely extended, the task of numeration would at length be terminated, even though in an eternity of time, if the phrase may be admitted; numbers could be applied to denote the aggregate. On the conclusion of the task, this stupendous fact would be evident, that this spherical universe of suns and systems, limited in number, would bear no proportion to the vast void which would surround it-a void, compared with which the fair fields of creation would be an atom; and from some distant point of space the whole of the vast assemblage would sink into the dim twinkling of a solitary star! But there is a consideration probable that matter is infinitely extended; for were the universe limited, the surrounding void would have no action on the bodies it environed; these would then exert all their gravitating force on each other; those systems on the confines of creation would be less acted upon in one direction than another, without any attractive influence to keep them in their position. In the other direction, these exterior systems would be most powerfully acted upon by the interior, which action would ultimately draw them towards the centre with accelerated velocity, till the whole would ultimately rush together and form one immense mass of matter. But when we admit that suns, and systems of suns, are continued without end, we see a counterbalance of this action, an equilibrium preserved, and the mind seems to be relieved from a species of horror.

If 'tis an error, 'tis an error sprung
From noble root, high thought of the Most High.
But wherefore error? who can prove it such?
He that can set Omnipotence a bound.
Can man conceive beyond what God can do?
Nothing but quite impossible is hard.
He summons into being with like ease
A whole creation and a single grain;
Strekk is the word, a thousand worlds are board. A thousand worlds there's space for millions more!

And in what space can his great flat fall? Darts not his glory a still brighter ray The less is left to Chaos?

These bodies, vast in magnitude, infinite in number, and the tenants of space, are in rapid motion; but what imagination can possibly conceive of that power which impels the movement? An idea may be acquired of this rapid motion by a reference to familiar objects-the velocity of a ship impelled by the wind, particularly if urged over the rolling billows by a furious tempest; the swiftness of a bird winging its flight through the air, especially if pursued by an eagle; the motion of a ball projected from a cannon, which, in some cases, is at the rate of 800 miles in an hour. But these are creeping things: Saturn, one of the most tardy in its course of any of the planets—a globe 900 times larger than the earth, is impelled at the rate of 22,000 miles in an hour, carrying with him a system of stupendous rings, and seven moons larger than the earth's satellite. Jupiter, whose vast circumference would comprise within it a thousand such globes as the one we inhabit, moves at the rate of 29,000 miles in an hour. This earth is urged forward at the rate of 68,000 miles in an hour; and Mercury still faster, being 107,000 miles in the same time: but even these motions are slow when compared with that of the comet of 1680, which went half round the sun in ten hours and a half, and its tail (at least an hundred millions of miles in length) turning round in the same time, keeping nearly in the direction opposite to the sun; the velocity of this comet, at this part of its orbit (its perihelion), was 880,000 miles in an hour; and so closely did it approach the sun, that supposing the centrifugal or projectile force to have been annihilated at this point of its course, it would have fallen into the sun in less than three minutes! In the sphere of the fixed stars there is reason to believe that bodies are in motion, whose velocities are proportionably greater than any in the planetary system. One of the double stars completes its revolution in fifty-seven years; in estimating the orbit described by a lesser sun about a greater, it will not be necessary to suppose (though probably it is the case) that the two bodies are as remote from each other as the nearest fixed star is from our sun, namely, twenty billions of miles: were it even admitted of the mind languish. Do we approximate a of a solitary star! But there is a consideration that the line of separation between them was boundary? that which bounds must itself be connected with this subject which renders it only a twentieth part of this distance, the re-

12,000,000 miles in an hour. This motion, observed among many of the fixed stars, confirms the belief that our sun, with its bright retinue of comets, planets, and satellites, is moving forwards through space with a velocity past conjecture. It is therefore probable that the solar system will never, in the course of its most protracted duration, ever revisit any part of the same curve or line it has moved over since the creation."

Of the double stars we have a good précis: we select a small part.

"Sir William Herschel has shewn that no two insulated stars can appear double to us, and that there are very many chances against the supposition that the great number of double stars which he has discovered should only appear to be double in consequence of the one being situated at a great distance behind the other, and out of the sphere of its attraction. Hence he concludes, that as casual situations will not account for the numerous phenomena of double stars, their existence must be owing to their mutual gravitation. This celebrated astronomer observed this double star (Castor) from the year 1778 to the year 1803, and could never perceive any variation in the distance of the two stars of which it is composed, which was invariably 17 of the diameter of the large one; in the angle of position, however, a remarkable change had taken place. In the mark, that the term ought to be exploded year 1779, November the 5th, the smaller star altogether from vegetable chemistry, since it was north of the larger one, and preceding it, in its diurnal motion, 32° 47'; on March 27, 1803, it had diminished to 10° 53', which was a decrease of 21° 54' in the space of 23 years and 142 days. From the measures of this angle, taken at intermediate times, it appeared that the angle of position had under-gone an irregular and gradual diminution. In the year 1759, Dr. Bradley had observed that larly, curious and interesting: the two horrors tor was, at all times of the year, parallel to the are assured are not to hurt usline joining Castor and Pollux; and Dr. Maskelyne had verified this result in 1760 and 1761. By this observation, Sir William Hers. chel obtained an addition of twenty years to the period, and thus found that the angle of position must then have been 56° 32' N. preceding. Hence, in the space of 43 years 142 days, the angle of position had diminished 45° 39'. From the regularity of its decrease, it is highly probable that the orbits in which the two stars move round their common centre of gravity, are nearly circular, and at right angles to the line in which we see them; and at the time of a whole apparent revolution of the small star round Castor will be 342 years and 2 months in a retrograde direction."

We do not say from the sublime to the ridiculous, but from the heavens to the earthfrom astronomy to natural history, (and without, on this occasion, questioning Mr. Rennie's theories). We choose a paragraph merely for its whim or truth, as it may be:

" Cat which caught Swallows on the Wing. We have frequently remarked the surprising rapidity with which beasts of prey pounce upon their victims; but the most striking instance which we recollect of this, was that of a cat who caught swallows on the wing. It was in the spring, when insects, in consequence of the cold, fly low, and of course the swallows are forced to hawk for their prey by skimming the surface of the ground. The wily cat, taking advantage of this, stretches herself upon a sunny grass-plot, with her legs extended as if she zing and tickling. The simple swallows, dreaming of no harm, and thinking they can here make a good meal, dip down from the barren air,-dart with open bill upon the flies; when puss, perceiving her prey within reach, makes a spring like a flash of lightning, and strikes down with her paw the poor thoughtless swallow. The best marksmen know how difficult it is to shoot a swallow on the wing; but the cat found her patience, cunning, and rapidity well rewarded by her unerring success whenever a swallow ventured within her reach."

" Sap of the Rose-tree. - From a plant of Rosa rubiflora at Hammersmith, with a stem 31 feet high, and 21 inches in diameter, when deprived of its branches, and the head sawed off, 29th July, thirty-one ounces of sap flowed in about a week, which, together with loss by evaporation, probably exceeded three pints. GARRICK CORRESPONDENCE: [Third Notice: Conclusion.]

Some of the correspondence relating to the poet Churchill possesses not only a personal, but literary and theatrical interest.

" Mr. Garrick to Mr. Lloyd.

" Hampton, Friday.

"Dear sir,-Whenever I am happy in the acquaintance of a man of genius and letters, l never let any mean, ill-grounded suspicions creep into my mind to disturb that happiness. Whatever he says, I am inclined and bound to believe; and therefore I must desire you not to vex yourself with unnecessary delicacy upon my account. I see and read so much of Mr. Churchill's spirit, without having the pleasure of his acquaintance, that I am persuaded that his genius disdains any direction, and that resolutions once taken by him will withstand the warmest importunity of his friends. At the first reading of his 'Apology,' I was so charmed and raised with the power of his writing, that I really forgot that I was delighted when I ought to have been alarmed. This puts me in mind of the Highland officer, who was so warmed and elevated by the heat of the battle, that he had forgot, till he was reminded by the smarting, that he had received no less than eleven wounds in different parts of his body. All I have to say, or will say, upon the occasion, is this:—if Mr. Churchill has attacked his pasteboard majesty of Drury Lane from revolving star would then move at the rate of patient as my uncle Toby, to endure their buz- | me merely because I am the Punch of the puppet-show, I shall not turn my back upon him, and salute him in Punch's fashion, but make myself easy with this thought_that my situation made the attack necessary, and that it would have been a pity that so much strong, high-coloured poetry should have been thrown away, either in justice or in friendship to so insignificant a person as myself. In his 'Rosciad' he raised me too high; in his 'Apology' he may have sunk me too low: he has done as his Israelites did, made an idol of a calf, and now the idol dwindles to a calf again! He has thought fit, a few weeks ago, to declare me the best actor of my time (which, by the by, is no great compliment, if there is as much truth as wit in his 'Apology'); and I will shew the superiority I have over my brethren upon this occasion, by seeming at least that I am not dissatisfied, and appear, as I once saw a poor soldier on the parade, who was acting a pleasantry of countenance, while his back was most wofully striped with the cat-o'-nine-tails. To be a little serious: you mentioned to me some time ago, that Mr. Churchill was displeased with me_you must have known whether justly or not:—if the first, you should certainly have opened your heart to me and have heard my apology; if the last, you should, as a common friend to both, have vindicated me, and then I might have escaped his 'Apology :' but, be it this, or that, or the other, I am still his great admirer, and, dear sir, your sincere friend and D. GARRICK. most humble servant,

"Mr. Churchill to Mr. Garrick.

" My dear Mr. Garrick, - Half drunkhalf mad-and quite stripped of all my money, I should be much obliged if you would enclose and send by the bearer five pieces, by way of adding to favours already received by, yours sincerely, CHARLES CHURCHILL."

" Mr. Garrick to Mr. Churchill.

"Dear Churchill,-I sent to you last night, but could not hear of you. I cannot conveniently this week obey your commands, but I will the latter end of the next. I have made a pur-chase that has beggared me; however, should you be greatly pressed, I will strain a point before that time, though I suppose it is the same thing to you. I was in hopes your ghost was laid, or at least your acrimony against the laureate, for still I cannot get it into my mind that your attack upon him is a justifiable one. I must entreat of you, by the regard you pro-fess to me, that you do not tilt at my friend Hogarth before you see me. You cannot sure he angry at his print? there is surely very harmless, though very entertaining stuff in it. He is a great and original genius: I love him as a man, and reverence him as an artist. I would not, for all the politics and politicians in the universe, that you two should have the least cause of ill-will to each other. I am sure you will not publish against him if you think twice. I am very unhappy at the thoughts of it. Pray, make me quiet as soon as possible, by writing to me at Hampton, or seeing me here. I am, dear Churchill, your most obedient

' At the Rev. Mr. Porter's, Woolwich." Our next extract embraces another name of dramatic and literary fame.

" Mr. R. B. Sheridan to Mr. Garrick. " Great Queen Street, January 10.

"Dear sir,-I have been about finishing the verses which were to have followed you to Althorp every day since you left town; and as were dead; the flies collect about her, as flies sentment, I should be sorry for it, though I am idle as such an employment is, I have been dialways do when they can find any animal as conscious it is ill-founded. If he has attacked verted from it by one thing or other still more idle even than rhyming. I believe I shall give tions upon your conduct and behaviour, I have even to the affectation of it where the person is very handsome, (for the grace of Venus, which passes all understanding, atones for an abundance of frailty,) and my bards shall be very easily recompensed.

In due proportion she rewards their tolls, Bows for a distich—for a stanza smiles; Bows for a distingtor a stanza sining; Familiar nods an epigram attend: An ode will almost rank you as a friend; A softer name fond clegy bestows; But nearest to her heart a sonnet flows.

I need not attempt to write you any news. I hear every where how valiantly you are fighting Cumberland's battles for him. I hope the bugle meets with due honour."

There is a good deal of humour in the following.

" Chitty's Creed.

"I believe in Mr. Charles Macklin, Mr. Samuel Foote, Dr. John Hill, Mr. R. Dexter, my wife, and myself. I believe the first to be the greatest scholar, the second to be the greatest wit, the third to be the finest writer, the fourth to be the best actor, the fifth to be the sweetest singer, and myself to be the greatest critic, that ever England saw. I believe myself superlatively happy in taking Miss Betty Norris to wife, as I believe Miss Betty Norris superlatively honoured in having me for a husband. I believe, now my wife has left Drury Lane theatre, that Garrick is the worst actor and manager that ever the stage was cursed with, and that nothing is done there with the least genius, decorum, or propriety. I likewise believe just the contrary of my worthy friend Rich, who has certainly some intentions of taking my aforesaid wife into his service next year. I believe (for reasons best known to myself) that Woodward is a very sad fellow, and that the cascade of real water which he has introduced in 'The Genii' at Drury Lane, is not half so natural as that of tin which is exhibited in the fair at Covent Garden. I believe that the late poem called 'The Hilliad' is the dullest of all compositions; not that I believe this from my own knowledge, but because I am informed so by my worthy and learned friend Dr. John Hill, who, I most sincerely believe. has not told one single lie since he knew me and praised my wife. I likewise believe in all the virtues of tar water; that they will be able to rectify the acid juices of my body, blunt, lubricate, and sheath those pungent particles which corrode my mind and heart, strengthen the present debilitated state of my carcass, and preserve it some time longer from the worms. Lastly, I believe there is no such a thing as a soul; for as I have had no feelings of one here, I cannot believe that I shall be troubled with one hereafter .-- Amen.'

" To those choice Spirits and enterprising Geniuses who call themselves the Town.

"Gentlemen, - As I look upon gratitude to be one of the chief moral virtues, I dedicate the following performance to you; for, from my intimate acquaintance with your persons, my up all attempts at versifying in future, for my been able to collect materials for a treatise upon efforts in that way always bring me into some the 'Art of Modern Criticism,' by which 'any foolish predicament; what I write in a hurry, young gentleman of a moderate fortune may I always feel to be not worth reading; and attain the character of critic in a very short what I try to take pains with, I am sure never time, without the assistance of parts or educa-to finish. However, such as it is, the poem shall tion. Many people who are ignorant of the salute your return, and it will then have the town and this art, will wonder that I have advantage of finding you less at leisure to be made it necessary for a gentleman who would critical; though indeed, but that I am not sure be a critic to have a moderate fortune: in the of your even receiving this at Althorp, I would first place, as a professed critic cannot well endeavour to acquit myself of my promise, follow, nor indeed is fit for, any other business, though something after the time. I mean to he will find great convenience in some herebe vastly civil to female talent of all sorts, and ditary assets; and in the next place, as I chiefly confine the art to the playhouse, where its professors chiefly exert themselves, there is no a great alteration for the better. 'Ay,' said admittance into the pit upon credit; not but the old gentleman, 'wish I could see him aim by the great ingenuity and intrepidity of some at wit once, I show hopes of him, and of you gentlemen, the expenses there are con- would indulge him in any thing. In short, I siderably diminished, particularly in the boxes; took upon me his education. I brought him and I do not doubt but by a proper economy, and an occasional use of your crab-sticks among the box-keepers, (who must not resist,) you may obtain that by conquest which has been hitherto got by contrivance only. This scheme is well worthy your attention, and, if accomplished, will greatly redound to the honour and father in debt some hundred pounds; and has interest of your community; and I dare affirm, upon a just calculation of the expenses, that if this is brought about, any young gentleman may be a perfect master of the whole Art of Modern Criticism for about one hundred and fifty pounds a-year, including taxes and repairs. I have indeed known some few gentlemen of no fortune, who, having commenced critics upon the slender foundation of a small running credit and some little address, have bustled one winter through the box-keepers, tailor, haberdasher, shoemaker, &c. meat, drink, washing, lodging, &c.; but as I look upon such experiments to be not only troublesome and dangerous, but often fatal too, I can never propose their examples for imitation. This treatise is designed as preparatory to the use of the cat-call, which instrument I shall slightly touch upon at the end of the work; and that it might be of real benefit to those youths of vivacity and spirit who are or shall be members of your 'Critical Society,' I have taken care to adapt it to the meanest capacity; and as there are many among you, gentlemen, who, either from the weakness of their eyes or some other natural imperfection, do not care to undergo the fatigue of reading themselves, I humbly beg leave to propose myself for that purpose, and am willing to read lectures upon taste and judgment one night every week during the winter, at the easy rate of threepence a-head; and if any of the young gentlemen of the society have a mind to recover their reading, I will attend them privately, at their own time and place, at half-a-crown a-month per youth, which, I believe, considering the pains I must take, cannot be accounted unreasonable. That the rules I have laid down in the following work, for modelling and completing a man of taste, might not be looked upon as merely imaginary, I must beg leave to relate the case of one Mr. Christopher -, only son to Abraham _____, Esq. justice of peace, of a small fortune, in the hundreds of Essex. I happened to spend a week at the justice's house with a relation of his, about last Christmas was two years, in which time Master Kit came home from school for the holydays. I found he was a voung man of a most hopeless capacity, which was not much improved by his country education. The old gentleman, who had rather more sense than his son, though not over-wise, In this way we have gone on through years knowledge of your abilities, and my observa- taking a liking to me, made me the confidence, never (except in one or two in-

of his uneasiness, and lamented his son's inabilities, and with tears in his eyes told me one day, 'Sir,' said he, 'my disappointment in my son Kit almost distracts me; I had once made myself happy with the hopes of seeing him make a figure as a justice of peace, when old age had rendered me unfit for the business; but, alas! sir, I am not so blind to my son's defects but I can perceive he wants capacity for it; and the utmost I can do now is to send him immediately to one of the universities, and breed him a clergyman.' I did not approve of the justice's intention, and told him if his son was to see the world, dress a little, and take upon him the man of taste, he would find a great alteration for the better. 'Av,' said to town, put him clerk to an attorney, and by the method I laid down in this treatise, the next winter he became one of the ringleaders of taste, and principal decider in all theatrical controversies: his natural dulness was changed to smartness and vivacity: he has run his acquired, by his particular talent of humour, the nickname of Kit the Smoker. And the justice has very readily mortgaged his estate for the pleasure of seeing his son a wit, and has never failed expressing his gratitude to me by continual presents of hares and partridges.

This last extract is in the handwriting of Garrick, and with it we conclude our notice of the work.

Frankland's Northern Travels. 2 vols. 8vo. [Second Notice.]

IT is, as our readers well know, a rule with us, if we cannot praise, not to speak unfavourably of publications of which we possess the earliest copies; and the just reasons for adopting this course might, we think, strike every judicious and impartial mind, without the necessity of explanation from us. But as it is often made a ground for impugning our criticisms, we beg permission to repeat, in a few words, what we have often stated before-the principles on which we proceed. The great circulation and the literary influence of the Gasette, render it an object with all publishers, artists, and scientific discoverers, to avail themselves of so eligible a medium for disseminating a knowledge of their several productions throughout the world-(for we say so truly, not boastingly; a fact felt and acknowledged by them all). It is consequently their almost invariable use to communicate to our journal the progress they are making, and as soon as possible the results. This course unquestionably imparts considerable value to our pages; but it is, now, with us too general to require being rewarded by any partial return, and we consider the advantage to be honourably repaid by the benefit of a fair and speedy description of, or criticism upon, the matter, of whatever kind it may be, which is thus literally spread on the wings of the press from Indus to the Pole, and in quarters of the earth hitherto unvisited by any English periodical. But it would be a most unjustifiable, as well as unkind abuse of these candid communications, were we to convert their information into articles subversive of the views and hopes of the parties concerned; turning against them, on our single opinion, what they had intrusted to our safe-keeping at least, if we found that we could not honestly promote their cause.

as much before the public as before our tribunal; and never offering an encomium which we believed to be undeserved, as a requital for any priority of intelligence. We have always stood, and stand, on equal terms; and we are contented with the approbation which has crowned our labours, as the best test of the manner in which they have been performedthe grand credit account, without a loss on either side, between the public and the Literary Gazette.

We now return to Captain Frankland-a man of family, apparently somewhat of the ex-quisite, a traveller, and an author. It may be remembered, that in our Review of his preceding two volumes (Literary Gazette, July 18, 1829) we attached some ridicule to his fondness for writing in a dialect three quarters English and a quarter French: to shew the absurdity of which, we scribbled half a column in a lingo three parts French and one part English (Literary Gazette for 1829, No. 652, p. 466). Our well-meant satire, however, has not cured the worthy captain of his propensity; and his new Travels in the North are nearly as thickly studded with unmeaning and unnecessary French phrases as his old (?) Travels in the South. The deformity being combined with much of the flippancy of fashion, and a great deal more of personal doings than is either instructive or amusing, might expose his book to much severity of remark, were it worth while to dissect midges, or break butterflies on the wheel. And though that is not essential, we cannot refrain from exhibiting some samples of these sottises, and belisss, and folies, &c. &c. &c., as our author would call them.

"In Sweden (we are wittily told) it is necessary to send an avant-courier, called 'forebud,' six hours in advance, to bespeak horses for you, for at the post-houses they have no beasts (excepting the post-master). At Warnamo the men were lounging about in long blue cloaks, and longer yellow hair. The few women we saw were as ugly as

"Do not forget the curious-looking Maypoles which every where meet the eye in Sweden, fantastically ornamented .- Johanni's tide." [This is a droll way of furnishing information, as if the reader must have gone the same route with the traveller, not to forget something or other.]

At Copenhagen, the same facetious flippancy (which informs us of nothing worth knowing) prevails. Witness the following:

" I have refrained hitherto from endeavouring to pronounce or to write the name of the street in which we lodge; it is a perfect Brobdignag: - ' Nya Kungsholmsbrogatan, Gotha Löen Quartier, No. 7; which, being interpreted, signifies 'New Street, in the King's Island, at the sign of the Golden Lion.' The weather is cold, but fine and frosty; the wind still east."

But before we arrive at Petersburgh, where we have the full measure of non-intelligence unsparingly lavished upon us, we quote another piece of pleasantry.

"To Lillpero eighteen wersts; to Hotacka The country more open. seventeen wersts. Wretched log villages, with gables to the street, as in Hungary. Bearded heads thrust out of holes in said gables, meant to represent windows (Saracen's head in Cheapside)."

We wonder so gallant a man as the Captain did not know Snowhill. There is, we can assure him, a material difference between that and Cheapside. But we must on to Peters- Heytesbury's en petit comité. The evening I of the opera. Here I likewise put en my dress, stances unwittingly) condemning what was not | burgh, the first entry respecting which is worth | passed at Madame de Laval's, and the charmnearly all the rest.

"We are exactly six weeks and two days from London. The whole journey has stood us in about sixty-nine pounds sterling each; cheap enough for 1600 miles. Good dinner and Château-margeaux, and good beds at twelve o'clock. So, good night! - Sept. 27."

"Sept. 29. From thence I went to the police-office for carte de residence. I dined ches Dubois, restaurateur François.

"Oct. 1. Visites en voiture chez les Codrington, Fullerton, Nicolay, Kotchubey, et Laval. Dinner at the ambassador's, where we met the Codrington party. In the evening the Russian play, and the Fullertons, where we danced and sang. From hence to Madame de Ficquelmont's, where I met my old friends the Maroness Rezende and the Chevalier Almeida, of the Brazilian mission, and made several new acquaintances; among others the Kassakowski, to whose house I am invited for the Sunday evenings."

At the opera, Tosi was "asses mal." " Diner chez Louis: Soirée chez Madame Ficquelmont."

Oct. 7. " I dined chez Dubois, and in the evening went to the opera, ' La Gazza Ladra, which was very ill sung indeed. I was bored to death, and did not go to M. Ficquelmont's.'

Oct. 9. " In the evening I went to Madame Simonoffska's and Madame Kossakowska's. where we danced and played jeux de société."

Oct. 12. " I walked with Gritti from two till four, when I went to dinner with Rehausen at Dumet's. At nine I went in pursuit of Madame Bagreeff's, which I could not find; and then to Madame Bazaine's, where nous nous sommes ennuyés. Rubini was indisposed. The contra-alt had a headache, Gritti had a cold. Enfin, une soirée manquée."

Oct. 15. "Dined at an Italian table-d'hôte with Gritti, Ballantyne, and Rubini. The women were frolicsome; and we passed the evening there aux petits jeux."

Oct. 17. "In the afternoon I went in quest of a lodging, at the house of the celebrated Madame G--, whom I had not yet seen. She is a fine woman, un peu passée. Her apartments are too extensive and expensive for a poor half-pay commander. In the evening the French play __ Madame M____, and the soirée chez la belle Comtesse de Fiequelmont."

"I dined alone, not being quite comfortable in the stomach: I hope it is not cholera morbus." [Luckily it was not, and so we are enabled to continue these extracts, which must be so invaluable to future visitors of the Russian capital.]

In the evening "went to the pretty Princess Youssoupoff's, where ennui et pelits jeux." Afterwards I flane'd in the Newski Perspective with sundry officers of the Imperial Guards à Cheval." "I flanc'd in the Newski Perspective, dined at Bouillery's, and passed the evening at home." "Visite chez la Kossakowska. I dined at Granci's, and went to the French play." " I dined at Madame Bhouse-warming. G and B dined there too. There was great fun between the imperial head-dresser and dentist; the first pulled out the second's teeth, and the second pulled off the first's peruke at table! The dentist proposes to make B fatter by cutting his teeth shorter!!! I have heard of horses being so treated, and successfully. At ten we went to Mademoiselle Demidoff's, where there was a perfect academia of singers. Here I remained selves under the inspection of Niccolini, and until one o'clock, A.M." "I dined at Lord with the assistance of the costumists and friscur ing Princess Youssoupoff's, where Chat et Rat et Cotillon." " In leaving the theatre, I caught a dreadful cold: one is obliged to wait in the portico for one's carriage." "Kourakin brought me home in his carriage." "M. de Boulgakoff is the director of the post of Petersburgh. Here I met a multitude of men of all classes and countries, but only three women. Gritti, Volkonski, and I, sang duos and trios until midnight. Madame de Boulgakoff is a charming person, and so is the sister of the postmaster, with whom I had much fun about love, physiognomy, craniology, &c. Oct. 28. (Nov. 9.) Dark and gloomy, but mild. My cold in the head is rather troublesome. I do not venture out to-day. Rubini came before dinner, and we sang the celebrated tenor air in the Pirate, 'Nel furor delle tempeste.' In the evening I went to the French play, and then Madame la Générale de Bazaine, until midnight, where des tours de cartes." "I spent a delightful hour with the charming Princess Youssoupoff, and her fair dame de compagnie. In the evening, visites en drosky ches les Boulgakoff, Kotchubey, Viliourski, and wind up at Madame Ficquelmont's." "After the opera I went to the Princess Youssoupoff's, where we made a sort of attempt at a charade-enaction, to amuse the ladies : Soulier : scene 1. two drunken gamblers (sous); 2d, tied together by a police officer, and dragged away (lics); 3d, a white satin shoe, borne upon a cushion, and tried upon the feet of the pretty ladies. The fair princess was the dear little Cenerentola." "To-morrow I must get my horse iceshod, and have a traineau." "In the evening I went to the French play, and afterwards to the soirée of la Comtesse Pouschkin, where I made several charming acquaintances. There were many very pretty women, particularly the Princess of Ouroussoff, the Princess Hilchkoff, the fair Tolstoy, and others. - sang 'In questo barbaro fatal istante,' and a troubadour.

Invite from la Comtesse Pouschkin for every Wednesday." Melancholy! "To-night there are no soirées, because, forsooth, this is the fifth anniversary of the death of Alexander! (Bad compliment to the reigning sovereign.)" Happiness again. "The evening I passed at the Boulgakow's où l'on a conjugé le verbe." "In the evening I made an abortive attempt at soirées; the Ficquelmonts did not receive, nor did the Bazaines; so home to bed at 11.30. P. M." " After dinner I had some music in my rooms. At half-past nine to the Lisianskis'; the Sopran did not come home from play; from thence to the Comtesse Pouschkin's, where music and flirtation until half-past two. Nov. 27. (Dec. 9.) This morning I reposed, after my fatigues of yesterday, until the sun had climbed to his meridian height, when, lighting up the windows of the Moïka, he woke me from my dreams of Elysium, to remind me that I must skait at two."

All these quotations occur between pages 182 and 215, in the first volume: suppose we skip some hundred pages, and see if the information becomes more worthy of being published in 2 vols. 8vo. No! dressing, singing, and killing time nonsensically, still furnish the description.

"At nine o'clock I drove to Paschkoff's, and found already a good many masks assembled. I was conducted by one of the little girls, beautifully dressed in the becoming costume of the country, to a room where I found Count Ludolf. Gritty, Tolstoy, and Paschkoff, equipping them-selves under the inspection of Niccolini, and consisting of white silk pantaloons, yellow boots, yellow justaucorps, cuirass, black velvet hat and plume, sword, and green velvet mantle; a pair of mustachios and a royale, completed my disguise. Then followed Russian chorusses and dances, the latter by the little daughters of the house and some pretty children, their friends, en costume du pays. The singing was now all finished, and we danced mazurka, walts, quadrille, gallope and gallopade, winding up with the dance of the 'Grand Papa,' a sort of Sir Roger de Coverley, peculiar to Germany. Henri III et sa Cour. Par Alexandre Dumas. Paris, 1829, Veyard et Cie.; Le Normant, père: Depôt Dramatique, Delaporte, London.

Catherine of Cleves; a Tragic Drama. 8vo. pp. 116. London, 1832. Andrews.

THE fate of this tragedy has been somewhat curious. Originally written in English, it was adopted into the French language, and is now re-translated into English again. Bussy d'Amboise, the drama which gave M. Dumas his plan, is the most original and striking of Chapman's plays; but with too much of the "King Cambyses' vein," that "tearing a passion to tatters," whose avoidance is the great mark of Shakespeare's infinite superiority, it being the prevailing taste of his era. Henri III is a striking proof of the extraordinary change that has taken place in French dramatic literature. What would Voltaire say, could he see one of the most successful tragedies on the modern stage derived from an English source, and from an author even more barbare than Shakespeare? nay, more-such evident acquaintance with our insular writers throughout? The song of the page, where a beauty is lessoned into kindness by a fading rose, and bidden seek that duration from love which is denied by time-is in the very spirit of our old madrigals. One of the most striking incidents, where Catherine passes her arm through the staple of the door, is familiar to all our readers-we all remember the act as that of Lady Catherine Douglas and Scott's Catherine Seyton; and another, on which the plot turns, will at once recall Othello and the fatal handkerchief.

M. Dumas's plot, from which Lord Leveson Gower's version is taken, is as follows: St. Megrin's (the Bussy d'Amboise of the old play) passion for the Duchess of Guise has not escaped the penetration of Catherine de Medicis, who, for the sake of creating that dissension which is her element of power, by the assistance of Ruggieri, an Italian astrologer connected with the court, contrives an interview between the duchess and her as yet unacknowledged lover; she is brought to the apartment while under the influence of a strong narcotic, which St. Megrin supposes is in con-sequence of a spell. Their interview is interrupted by the Duke of Guise, who demands admission. Catherine of Cleves is hurried off by Ruggieri, and the duke enters: his errand is to request the astrologer's assistance in making out a pedigree; when, finding his wife's handkerchief, his suspicions are excited, and he resolves on revenge. A spirited scene next occurs, where the king authorises the duel between his favourite St. Megrin and the duke, ostensibly on political grounds. The duke now forces the duchess to write a letter to St. Megrin, appointing him to come that night, in the disguise of a Leaguer, to her chamber. At first she resists-is even ready to take the poison he offers; but on his grasping her arm with his gauntlet, she writes: (Sir Walter Scott again). St. Megrin hastens to the appointment_is undeceived_and endeavours to escape by the balcony; but a party of assassins are waiting, and he falls covered with wounds. Still, life is not extinct, for the king has given him a talisman which secures him from perishing by fire or sword-the duke flings down the handkerchief, with which he is strangled. This reveals all to the duchess, who sinks insensible on the stage. So closes the French tragedy. But Lord Leveson Gower makes the duchess take the poison which she had secreted from the last interview with her husband—protest her innocence with her latest breath—and, dying, leave the duke in an agony of despair. is in exact conformity with our English taste; we do "especially affect" the heroine's dying at full length; and that the murderer shall be punished, at least by remorse. Our readers will perceive one great, indeed insurmountable, difficulty,-you cannot get over the improbability, not to say absurdity, of the duchess yielding her lover to the death rather than be pinched. A pinch is a strange thing to be the pivot on which a tragedy turns! Chapman pivot on which a tragedy turns! manages this at least more terribly, for the duchess is put on the rack.

The great merit of Henri III is a rich picturesque tone, which gives a striking reality to its scenes; its characters are strongly marked with all the characteristics of their age. Much of this necessarily evaporates in a translationwe have no old associations to be awakened by the poet; and the translator has, perforce, been obliged to adopt the romantic, not the historic part of the drama. The play itself has been cut down from five acts to three; yet some of the speeches are elongated, and not, we think, to advantage; for example, Lord Leveson Gower's challenge runs thus-

"But naked to the waist it is my practice
To meet my foes: and when I set the example,
Let him who dare not shew how his heart beats
Accept the coward's name with which I brand him."

We prefer the brief defiance of the original And we shall see whose heart it is that beats. Again, the speech of St. Megrin where he cautions the page to secrecy:

"Arthur. Fear not: I love a secret, and am proud To have one of St. Megrin's in my keeping.
St. Megrin. Ay, but that secret is a terrible trust. Bear it about thee like some venomous drug, Which, if the slightest portion of its easence But for an instant mingle with the air, is death to all around thee. Thou art young: Let not companionship with such a guest Make thee look old and care-worn ere thy time—Be gay, and ostentatious in thy gaiety! Avoid me. But if we must meet, be silent; For I can guess the slightest sign and gesture, Without the perilous use of speech or writing. Do this, and if in war or love hereafter, The purse, the sword, or counsel of a friend, The purse, the sword, or counsel of a friend, Can serve, think of St. Megrin, and command him. Away! shun all observers.

The French is much more simple and much more expressive :—

Arthur. Count, I am proud to have one secret ours. St. Megrin. Yes, but a terrible secret—one of those Which kill.

See that thy countenance betray it not; Let not thine eyes reveal it. Thou art youn Keep thou thine eye's carelessness and mirth. If we meet, pass me—know and mirth. Keep thou thine eye's carelessuess and mirth. If we meet, pass me—know me, see me not. If in the future thou hast aught to tell me, Speak not in words, and trust it not to paper—A sign, a look, will tell me all; I'll read Thy slightest gesture, guess thy secret thought. I cannot pay the happiness I owe thee; But need my aid or succour, come to me, And whatsoe'er thou askest, by my soul! "Tis thine—were it my blood. Go, go—Watch that none see thee go. Adieu, adieu!

We object particularly to the introduction of the imagery about the "poisonous drug: overwhelming passion goes about to seek no prettinesses of expression—similes are rarely used in strong agitation. Another great fault of this kind occurs in the scene between the duke and the duchess in Lord Gower's translation:

"Duchess. This is some jest to fright me.
You never did—you could not—entertain
The frightful thought.
Guise. I cannot choose but laugh

At my own jest.

Duchess. That laugh!—Despair, despair!" Now, the literal rendering of this passage would we think, have been infinitely more effective: Duchess. 'Tis but a jest to fright me; you have not— You cannot have—this exectable thought. Guise (smiling). A jest, madam! Duchess. No! your smile has told me all.

But if in some instances we hold that a closer adherence to the original would have been desirable, in others we think the translator has improved upon his text. The merit of the following spirited passage belongs almost entirely to him. St. Megrin says to the king-

"Will not your nobles, rallying round your person, Pour back their wealth into the liberal fount From whence it sprung? Is not that wealth your own Let our flocks bleed, and let our forests fall, Let our flocks bleed, and let our forests fail, Let our red vintage freely flow, to bear The charges of that war. We shall not grudge Harvest or flock—our red wine or red blood. If gold be wanting, we can coin our mantles, Where finger-deep the rich embroidery stiffens; Melt down our ladies' ciphers in the crucible, And load our petronels with golden bullets."

For our theatrical criticism we refer to an other part of our paper. There are some interesting notes; and we shall probably take a more enlarged and leisurely view of the whole subject (the three plays) next week.

Eliot, Hampden, and Pym; or, a Reply of "the Author of a Book" entitled "Commentaries on the Life and Reign of Charles I."
to "the Author of a Book" entitled "Some Memorials of John Hampden, his Party, and his Times." London, 1832. Colburn and Bentley.

A PAMPHLET which Mr. D'Israeli has thought it necessary to publish in vindication of some of the statements made by him in his Commentaries on the Reign of Charles I. against the counter-statements of Lord Nugent. It will not be expected that we should enter into the various points at issue between this ingenious writer and his noble antagonist; - we shall content ourselves by remarking, that there is an old adage of, those who play at bowls must expect rubbers and pretty sharply has Mr. D'Israeli rubbed his lordship. The pamphlet, however, like every thing which comes from the pen of Mr. D'Israeli, is an amusing one; and, without at present entering into the controversy, we are enabled to illustrate our assertion by the following extract relative to the loss of some interesting family records.
"Every lover of history will deeply regret the utter recklessness of families of ancient or distinguished descent, which too often exists in regard to their domestic archives. The most authentic documents of history - the most pre-vilest uses; and papers are dispersed, or wasted, which some distinguished ancestor had hoarded as treasures for posterity. I recollect, when once mentioning to a lady, the female descendant of Lord Hardwicke, how great our obligations were to that noble literary antiquary, her ladyship had formed no other notion of the unremitted labours of her grandfather, but that of having 'filled the house with old papers; the dusty memorials were poked in all parts. It was by my zeal that the later correspondence of Lady Mary Wortley Montague was recovered from the wreck of useless family papers. The public have been often reminded of the accident which preserved the MSS. of Evelyn; documents which have thrown much light on some dark passages of our domestic history. Recently, the voluminous state papers, diaries, and writings of the famous Lord Fairfax, have been dispersed by sale in many hands. The case which I am now to state seems not less interesting. The literary friend who communicated to me the information concerning Hampden's quarrels with the treasurer of the county, was on a visit at an ancient mansion in Buckinghamshire. Confined to the house by illness, he could not partake of their outdoor amusements, but cast his antiquarian eye over the old map of the estate hanging in the hall, or on the pedigree of the family embellished with many beautifully executed miniatures, one of the finest of heraldic documents. His avarice for old papers broke out in all its passion, and his kind hostess charitably offered to procure him more amusements of the sort. An old chest of papers and parchments lay in an uninhabited apartment. Cold and damp made him hurry over the contents of the chest, where he discovered layers of papers, without any arrangement, from the last century about Garrick's time, as he went downwards, to the reign of John. Among other things which he turned out of the chest, was a small green and gold purse, of antique manufacture, with some Elizabeth's shillings and sixpences in it, and some love-letters to a former proprietor of the mansion. 'It seemed, in short,' as he wrote to me, 'as if for many centuries upon the decease of the head of the house, his papers had been thrown into this chest, and there suffered to remain undisturbed until the time of my tumbling them out.' He filled two baskets with papers of Charles the First's time, and others, to examine at his leisure in a warmer apartment. He met with parcels of ship-money receipts unsigned. The most interesting document was a manuscript, which, when put together, consisted of fourteen to fifteen hundred pages of foolscap paper, and not complete, while parts, as usual, were injured by damp. Appearing, at first, to be a book of accounts, it would probably have been laid aside had not his eye caught the name of Hampden. The handwriting was attested to be that of the treasurer of the county; and, on further scrutiny, it was discovered to have been the journal of that magistrate. There were inserted long dialogues between the writer and Hampden. The subject was a dispute or litigation about a piece of common land. The writer recounted his meeting Hampden, who, he said, 'raised his whip at me, and I did the same at him, but he dared not cross the hedge which stood between us.' In one or two places appeared a character of Hampden, written in 'the most bitter terms that 'envy, hatred, and malice, could suggest.' An extraordinary circumstance attending this manuscript is, that, at present, it is not to be found. It was taken out of the afterwards looked for. Should it have escaped the vulcanian fire of the chef de cuisine, it may yet be discovered in the place to which it was removed when it first emerged to the intelligent eye of my friend."

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

EUGENE ARAM.

THE recollection of this man is still preserved at Lynn, in Norfolk, at which town he was for some time usher at the grammar-school. A small room at the back of the house, in which he slept, was, until these last few years, (when it was pulled down and rebuilt,) mysteriously pointed to by the little urchins as they passed up to bed of a cold, ghost-enticing night, as the chamber in which the "usher, who was hanged for murder," was used to sleep.

The tradition which remains of his character is, that he was "a man of loneliness and mystery," sullen and reserved; that on half-holydays, and when his duties would allow, he strayed solitary and cheerless, as if to avoid the world, amongst the flat uninteresting marshes which are situated on the opposite side of the river Ouse.

At Lvnn the character of Aram was, until his apprehension, unexceptionable; but after that event, circumstances were then called to mind which seemed to indicate a naturally dark character; but whether these were all strictly founded in truth, or magnified suspicions arising from the appalling circumstances of the crime of which he was convicted, I am unable to determine. The following, derived from unquestionable authority, having been related by Dr. L., who was master of the grammarschool at the time, may serve as a sample :there can be no doubt but that the worthy Dr. himself believed his suspicions well founded, as he used to tremble when he related it. It was customary for the parents of the scholars, on an appointed day, to dine with the master, at which time it was expected they would bring with them the amount of their bills. It was late at night, after one of such meetings, that Dr. L. was awakened by a noise at his bedroom door; he rose up, and going into the passage which led to the staircase, but which was not in the direct way from Aram's bed-room to the ground-floor, he discovered the usher dressed. Having questioned him as to the object of his rising at that unseasonable hour, Aram confusedly answered that he had been taken unwell, and had been obliged to go down stairs. The Dr. then retired, unsuspiciously, to bed. From the combined circumstances of the noise at the door, his great agitation and confusion, and from his being found in the passage, the worthy Dr., in later years, had no doubt, that, from its being known to Aram that a considerable sum of money was in his bed-room, Aram intended nothing less than to rob him; and no doubt, continued the narrator, he would have murdered me too, if it had been rendered necessary, from my discovering or opposing him.

The spot just at the entrance to the play-ground, at which Aram was taken into custody by two strange men from Yorkshire, is still remarked, and generally by the young scholar in a tremulous whisper.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.

On Tuesday evening in last week the members re-assembled. Joseph Hume, Esq. took the cious memorials of genius, are consigned to the chest, where, on a subsequent inquiry, it was chair at eight o'clock, and communicated to the Society that Mr. Brockedon would com- pared with etching ground. The lines were all mence a series of illustrations on subjects connected with the arts, &c.

Mr. Brockedon then informed the meeting, that the subject upon which he was about to effect was a perfect imitation of the light, shade, offer some remarks, was ... " the applicability of the different styles of engraving in art: that he did not propose to enter upon the history of engraving - much had been, and ably, written on the subject; neither did he intend to enter into the details of its chemical and mechanical manipulation, which had already been given by the able secretary of the institution. Engraving, he observed, possessed the power of repeating and multiplying all designs which represent natural or imaginary objects, with the conventional omission of colour. Many engravers have contended that they represent even that quality; but as they have never agreed how red, blue, or yellow, which has no existence in the print, is to be addressed to the understanding of the observer, he would leave them to explain the anomaly of the pretence.

Mr. Brockedon then shortly described the processes by which they were effected, and the distinct characters of engraving, in line, chalk, mezzotint, aquatint, soft ground, etching, wood engraving, and lithography; then, taking up each mode separately in an inverse order, he illustrated from the capabilities of each its peculiar adaptation to the different ends and objects of the art, and referred to the splendid examples lying on the tables, and hung around the room, for the justification of his remarks. Mr. Brockedon adverted, in mezzotinto, to some fine portraits by Mr. Charles Turner and Mr. Cousins, and particularly to " the Storm," engraved by the former from the Marquess of Stafford's picture; and he also made some detailed observations upon Mr. Martin's splendid works. But it was in line engraving there existed the most splendid examples before him: he expressed his admiration of the works of Woollett, Strange, Sharp, Finden, Doo, Burnet, and others, and pointed out the grounds of their excellence.

Mr. Brockedon particularly observed on the rapid advancement engraving had achieved, comparatively speaking, within a few years in the tones and chiaro scuro of the works produced; and concluded a most able exposition of the art an exposition which the experienced practitioner would have allowed to have been most correct in arriving at the desired results - by referring to one or two points connected with the Society. He powerfully eulogised the Society for the services it had rendered to the Arts, and especially that of engraving. He observed, that there were few names which had reached distinction that were not to be found in the records of the institution. Among the engravers who had received the encouragement of the Society were, Raverret, Vivares, Bewick, Dunbarton, Woollett, Sherwin, Raimbach, Landseer, Sharp, and Finden. That the Society had directed the attention of the public to discoveries in the art, whether mechanical or chemical; and one of the most important of these was the introduction of steel blocks, by Mr. Perkins. The introduction of steel plates, for line engraving, by Charles Warren; and for mezzotinto, by Lupton and Turner, who were severally rewarded by the Society, were also specified.

Previous to the close of the lecture, Mr. Pole, Vice-President of the Society, placed in Mr. Brockedon's hands some new and beautiful engravings, fac-similes of medals which were actually traced by a peculiar pentagraph, from the surface of the medal itself, upon a plate pre-of the same thickness; but the irregularity of the surface producing a variation of their distances from each other in particular parts, the and tint of the medal. The art is limited, but to its extent is beautiful. The Americans and French both claim the discovery; but these specimens were produced by the late Mr. Bawtry, of the Bank, who, without knowing their process, affected it himself.

The great room was decorated with many valuable prints from Messrs. Moon, Boys, and Graves; Messrs. Colnaghi; and other members.

The Society met on the following evening (Wednesday); but in consequence of the adjournment of committees during the vacation. nothing passed deserving of particular notice, unless we mention that of a capstan on an improved principle, which was strongly recommended for the Society's sanction. Several negatives were also announced, viz. an instrument for computing triangles, tables for arithmetical operations, and a reciprocating engine. A report was read, too, on the introduction of nutmegs into the West Indics; and other communications were made: one, rather of an extraordinary kind - a case for a clock, manufactured and richly ornamented in glass. Many claims for premiums in the branch of polite arts were announced, which, of course, were referred to that committee.

LINNEAN SOCIETY.

MR. LAMBERT in the chair .- This was one of the most numerously attended meetings that have taken place for several sessions.—Another portion of Mr. Ogilby's paper on the history and distribution of marsupial animals was read This communication is intended chiefly to give an account of those animals belonging to this class which are natives of Australia, where the marsupalia constitute the greater portion of the quadrupeds. The author proposes to give a hew distribution of them, according to their habits, and divides them into five families, which he has denominated, 1st, Scansores; 2d, Saltores; 3d, Fossores; 4th, Cursores; and, 5th, Monotremes. Several gentlemen were elected fellows. A fine collection of plants from New Zealand was presented by Mr. G. Bennett, who has been for three years engaged in investigating the natural history of the South Pacific.

ROYAL ASTRONOMICAL SOCIETY.

FR. BAILY, Esq. in the chair. - A communication from Sir James South on the projection of stars on the moon's disc, and containing numerous observations of occultations, was read. There were also read other papers on occulta-tions, from Professor Airy, of Cambridge, and Mr. Smith, Bedford. The reading of Sir J. Herschel's paper on the orbits of binary stars was concluded. It was intimated to the meeting, that the King of Denmark had offered a medal for the discovery of a new comet, without the aid of the telescope, as was understood: - this reward, therefore, may be almost considered as one for the discovery of an invisible comet! Several gentlemen were elected fellows; amongst them was Mr. Henderson, astronomer at the Cape of Good Hope, and successor to the Rev. F. Fallows, whose death and devotion to astronomical science at the Cape was lately noticed in the Literary Gazette. Señor Cerquero, the astronomer at Cadiz, was elected an associate.

GEOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

JANUARY 18th, 1832 .- Mr. Murchison, President, in the chair. - Several fellows were elected. A memoir was first read on the geological structure of the Crimea, by Baron Sunislaus Chaudoir, communicated by Sir Alexander Crichton. A paper by Thos. Bell, Esq. F.G.S. was afterwards read, on a new species of fossil tortoise, found in the lacustrine formation of Eningen. The memoir was illustrated by the fossil specimen, and by the skeleton of the recently-called species Chelydra serpentins. Presents were announced from various contributors to the museum and library. After the business of the evening, it was announced that the ordinary meeting on the 15th of February would not take place, in consequence of the annual general meeting being fixed for the 17th of the same month.

LITERARY AND LEARNED.

ROYAL SOCIETY.

Dr. Bostock in the chair .- A paper was Mr. Ivory. The reading of another paper, "on Voltaic electricity," by the Rev. William Ritchie, Professor of Natural Philosophy in the Royal Institution and London University, was also commenced. Professor Ritchie in this paper enters into a full experimental investigation of the origin and laws of action of Voltaic electricity in an elementary battery; and examines in detail the theory and laws of action of the compound battery of Volta. As this valuable paper contains new views, supported by experiments, on this interesting subject, we shall endeavour, when it has been read before the Royal Society, to give our readers an out-line of the laws deduced by Mr. Ritchie from these researches. The Literary Society at Quebec presented the new volume of its Memoirs; and Professor Brogniart, of Paris, his new chart of the earth's strata.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.

Mr. HAMILTON in the chair .- The secretary continued the reading of Mr. Gage's paper on the Duke of Devonshire's magnificent manuscript, mentioned in our last. It branched into a dissertation on ecclesiastical manuscripts in general, and the style of their illuminations and initial letters at different periods. Mr. Gage observed, that the English, in the 10th and 11th centuries, excelled the rest of Europe in their manuscripts, and in their embroidery of ecclesiastical vestments, &c. With reference to the Benedictional of St. Ethelwold, he noticed the graceful drapery and figures in many of the illuminations; but observed, that in most of the ancient manuscripts, where any part of the figure was represented naked, the drawing was very inferior to that of the dra-

THE PRESS IN EGYPT.

AFTER the example of Constantinople, where there has been a printing-office for above a century, which has been productive of much good, the present Pasha of Egypt founded, as is generally known, a similar establishment, about ten years ago, at Bulah, near Cairo; where Persian, Arabic, and Turkish works are printed. The Arabic language is spoken by the natives in general: the Turkish is the mother tongue of the Pasha and of most of the members of his government; and the Persian is cultivated by many Turks and Arabs. From this office there have issued, up to this time, nine grammatical works, three dictionaries, three historical works, four on the Mahometan religion (of which one bears the title of "the Shortest Way to the Rendesvous of Lovers, and the Messenger of Passion to the Abode of Peace; or, a Treatise on the Merit and the Duties of the Holy War, that is to say, of the War which the Mussulmen are bound to wage with Nations that are not of their Faith: in Arabic, in the year of the Hegira 1242"), four poetical, three reheterical, six mathematical, two medical, three commercial, eleven military and naval, one of which is in the Turkish language, from the French of the present Admiral Truguet, who wrote it at Constantinople by order of Louis XVI.

Dr. Lardner recently vacated the professor's chair in this University, and Mr. Ritchie was chosen in his place.

The printing-office at Bulah was organised according to the directions of Don Raphael. formerly professor of vulgar Arabic in the school of the living oriental languages at Paris, in the Royal Library. The superintendent of the establishment is an Egyptian, who studied in 1819, at the same time with Osman Bey, now major-general in the Egyptian service. The works we have mentioned have many defects, as is usual in the infancy of any institution. None of them has a title-page; many are even without any title or the name of the author; and the pages are badly numbered. It is likely, however, that the Bulah press will soon receive a beneficial impulse through the mission of those Egyptians who have been studying in France since 1826, under the direction of M. Jomard: for this mission will furnish persons capable of translating the most useful works from French into Arabic. The Sheik Refaa, one of those at Paris who have acquired skill in translating, has arrived at Cairo, and is already at work. So rapid is the advance of time, that scarcely have we heard of the Arabic and Turkish gazette at Cairo, and of the Turkish and French journal at Constantinople, when we are informed of a similar journal at Canea, in the island of Candia. This journal is published in the Turkish and modern Greek languages: the Turkish title is, Events in Crets; and the Greek title, Cretan Ephemeris. The Egyptian government had hardly established itself in Candia, when it introduced this means of public communication. One of the latest numbers of this journal contains some ordinances of the government relative to the sanitary police. It is well known that the cholers and other similar disorders have afflicted the East, and particularly Egypt, as well as Europe: the government takes care to have all that is done in Europe on this subject printed, and posted up in the most public places. What new ideas must such measures awaken in the minds of the people!

FINE ARTS. NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Our Saviour and his Disciples, in Seventeen superb Copperplate Engravings, comprising the whole Group of Figures from Raphael's celebrated Picture of the Transfiguration. G. Cockburn.

This appears to be a republication in this country of a series of folio plates, from drawings by J. Goubaud, engraved by the various pupils of his Calcographie Royale, at Brussels. They are executed in stipple, in a broad, simple, and forcible style of art; and convey a very satisfactory notion of the powers of expression of that illustrious painter, who, as has been justly observed by the venerable Mr. Gunn, in his Cartonensia, "seems to have been cadowed."

with a faculty of such particular quality, as enabled him to discover with certainty, among the variety of surrounding circumstances, those cognate or congenial qualities which each particular mind would attract to itself, and which, from the constitution of its nature, would combine with it in the formation and developement of its character. Possessed of this faculty in a degree exciting our astonishment and admiration, he could mark, with unerring accuracy, the boundary which separated each individual character from every other of the same species, and thus invest it with an unalienable individuality."

It is with peculiar propriety that a work calculated to be so useful to the student in art, is dedicated (by permission) to the President of the Royal Academy.

Illustrations of Byron's Works.

WE have seen proofs of several of the illustrations of Mr. Murray's new and complete edition of the works of Lord Byron, engraved by the Findens, which do those ingenious artists the highest credit. "Belem Castle," and "Yarina," engraved by E. Finden from drawings by Stanfield, are exceedingly clever: but our admiration has been chiefly excited by a head of "Theresa, the Maid of Atkens," engraved by W. Finden, from a drawing by F. Stone, after an original picture by T. Allasen, Esq. It is impossible to conceive a countenance of more finished beauty, or more replete with bewitching sentiment.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

SCOTTISH LITERARY DINNER.

NOTWITHSTANDING the shortness of the time fer preparation, this festival, on Wednesday next, promises to be as brilliant as numerously attended. Sir Jehn Malcolm, himself an emi nent example of the rise of Scots talent (as is also his brother Sir Pultney), is to take the chair; round which many noble and distinguished individuals have already signified their intention to rally. We regret that we have not access to their names, or that they can hardly, for a day or two, be even partially announced to the public; but we understand that on the list of stewards, besides Scottish peers, are Lord F. L. Gower, Sir M. Shawe Stewart, Sir George Warrender, Sir J. Hay, Sir G. Murray, Sir J. Macintoch, Sir John Reid, Sir James Shaw, Sir P. Laurie, Sir J. Rennie, of Members of Parliament, Mesers. Grans, Bulwer, M'Killop, Mackinnon, Traile, Scott, &c. &c.; — of literary men, Meser, Sotheby, T. Campbell, Lockhart, T. Hook, Galt, Cunningham, Pringle, Croker, Coleridge, Jerdan, Maginn, W. Fraser, Logan, and many others: and of other classes, eminent artists, &c., Sir M. Shee, Wilkie, Chantrey, Spottiswoode, Stuart, Murchison, John Murray, Wardrop, A. Hastie (with the London Burns' Club), Richardson, Boyd Miller, B. Boyd, Ferguson, Anderson, Martin, Fullarton, T. Telford, Captain Basil Hall, Capt. T. Blair, and fifty other leal Scotsmen. Previous to this eccasion, we have much pleasure in copying a tribute to Burns from the pen of Mr. Hallick, one of the aweetest of American poets.

Lines to a Rose brought from near Alloway Kirk, in Ayreshire, in the Autumn of 1822.
Wild Rose of Alloway, my thanks!
Thou 'mindst me of that autumn noon When first we met upon ' the banks
And brace o' bonny Doon.'

Like thine beneath the thorn-tree's bough, My sunny hour was glad and brief; We've crost'd the winter sea, and theu Art wither'd, flower and leaf. And will not thy death-doom be mine— The doom of all things wrought of clay— And wither'd my life's leaf like thine, Wild rose of Alloway?

Not so his memory for whose sake
My bosom bore thee far and long—
His, who a humbler flower could make Immortal as his song—

The memory of Burns—a name
That calls, when brimmed her festal cup,
A nation's glory, and her shame,
In silent sadness up.

A nation's glory,—be the rest
Forgot—she's canonised his mind;
And it is joy to speak the best
We may of human kind.
I've stood beside the cottage bed

Where the Bard-peasant first drew breath—
A straw-thatch'd roof above his head,
A straw-wrought couch beneath.

A straw-wrought cours bester.

And I have stood beside the pile,
His monument, that tells to heaven
The homage of earth's proudest lale
To that Bard-peasant given!

Bid thy thoughts hover o'er that spot, Boy-minstrel, in thy dreaming hour; And know, however low his lot, A poet's pride and power.

The pride that lifted Burns from earth, The power that gave a child of song Ascendency o'er rank and birth, The rich, the brave, the strong.

And if despondency weigh down
Thy spirit's fluttering pinions then,
Despair—thy name is written on
The roll of common men.

There have been loftier themes than his, And longer scrolls, and louder lyres, And lays lit up with Poesy's Purer and holler fires.

Yet read the names that know not death, Few nobler ones than Burns are there; And few have won a greener wreath Than that which binds his hair.

His is that language of the heart, In which the answering heart would speak, Thought, word, that bids the warm tear atast, Or the smile light the cheek;

And his that music, to whose tone
The common pulse of man keeps time, is cot or castle's mirth or mosm,
In cold or sunny clime.

And who hath heard his song, nor kneit Before its spell with willing knee, And listen'd, and believed, and felt The poet's mastery

O'er the mind's sea, in calm and storm, O'er the heart's sunshine and its showers, O'er Passion's moments, bright and warm, O'er Reason's dark, cold hours;

On fields where brave men "die or do,"
In halls where rings the banquet's mirth,
Where mourners weep, where lovers woo—
From throne to cottage bearth?

What sweet tears dim the eyes unshed, What wild vows falter on the tongue, When 'Scots wha hae w' Wallace bled,' Or 'Auld Lang Syne,' is sung!

Pure hopes that lift the soul above Come with his Cottar's hymn of praise, And dreams of youth, and truth, and love, With 'Logan's' banks and brass.

And when he breathes his master-lay Of Alloway's witch-haunted wall, All passions in our frames of clay Come thronging at his call.

Imagination's world of air,
And our ewn world, its gloom and glee,
Wit, pathos, poetry, are there,
And death's sublimity.

And Burns—though brief the race he ran, Though rough and dark the path he trod, Lived, died, in form and soul a man, The image of his God.

Through care, and pain, and want, and woe, With wounds that only death could heal— Tortures the poor alone can know, The proud alone can feel,

He kept his honesty and truth, His independent tongue and pen, And moved in manhood and in youth, Pride of his fellow-men.

Strong sense, deep feeling, passions strong, A hate of tyrant and of knave, A love of right, a scorn of wrong, Of coward, and of slave;

A kind, true heart, a spirit high,
That could not fear and would not bow,
Were written in his manly eye
And on his manly brow.

Praise to the bard! his words are driven, Like flower-seeds by the far winds sown, Where'er, beneath the sky of heaven, The birds of faine have flown.

Praise to the man! a nation stood Beside his collin with wet eyes— Her brave, her beautiful, her good-As when a loved one dies.

And still, as on his funeral day,
Men stand his cold earth-couch around,
With the mute homage that we pay
To consecrated ground.

And consecrated ground it is—
The last, the hallow'd home of one Who lives upon all memories, Though with the buried gone.

Such graves as his are pilgrim-shrines, Shrines to no code or creed confined. The Delphian vales, the Palestines, The Meccas of the mind.

Sages, with Wisdom's garland wreathed, Crown'd kings, and mitred priests of power, And warriors with their bright swords sheath'd, The mightlest of the hour-

And lowlier names, whose humble home
Is lit by Fortune's dimmer star,
Are there—o'er wave and mountain come,
From countries near and far—

Pilgrims, whose wandering feet have prest The Switzer's snow, the Arab's sand, Or trod the piled leaves of the West, My own green forest-land—

All ask the cottage of his birth, Gaze on the scenes he loved and sung, And gather feelings not of earth His fields and streams among.

They linger by the Doon's low trees,
And pastoral Nith, and wooded Ayr,
And round thy sepulchres, Dumfries!—
The poet's tomb is there.

But what to them the sculptor's art,
His funeral columns, wreaths, and urns?
Wear they not graven on the heart
The name of ROBERT B. RNS?

As the Ettrick Shepherd is to be present at this dinner, as well as Captain Burns, a son of the poet, we do ourselves the pleasure of printing an address to him from the pen of Mr. Brandreth, whose taste and feeling in song are well known.

Bard, who from Scotland's sons of song,
Hast come to England's minstrel shore;
Welcome to all! and may'st thou long,
For all, thy music sweet outpour.
Whether thou treadst the Southron lea,
Or that where Ettrick's gowan blooms,
Be ours to twine, for thee, for thee,
Round Scotland's thistle England's rose.

Bard of the many-volced lyre,
Waking allke the smile and tear;
Now glowing bright with patriot fire,
Now litting songs to Nature dear,
The homeward kine still tread the strath,
With lightsome step, at evening's close;
Thou treadst where bloom, to grace thy path,
With Scotland's thistle England's rose.

With Scotland's thistic England's rose.

Bard, dear to all, but most to them
Who knew thee when, beside the burn,
'Twas thine to sit and shrine each gem
That, trembling, pearl'd Tweed's crystal urn;
When next thy foot is on that lea
Where Ettrick's mountain gowan blows,
Forget not them who twined for thee
Round Scotland's thistle England's rose.

With this we conclude our intimation; and we heartily join the committee of management in hoping, that, as this wide metropolis cannot be sufficiently invited within the brief space in which they have had to act by circulars and advertisements, hundreds of the lovers of Scottish literature, of all ranks, will hasten to volunteer to their aid.

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

THE GARRICK CLUB

THE Garrick Club opens, at its house in King Street, on the 1st of February, with H. R. H. the Duke of Sussex in the chair. The despatch in fitting up a poor hotel for the reception of a numerous Society would have been extraordinary any where out of the shine of Aladdin's lamp, except in London, where another sort of shine can do any thing. But we can add, that in this instance the lamp has been | peared to be quite at home, and played the last wisely trimmed, and an association formed, whose object is to encourage the national drama, on a scale at once economical and effi-It remains to be seen whether that which merely, as a club-house, is calculated to her second dress is more remarkable for richbe pleasant and entertaining, will also have the power to exercise a prominent influence in raising and regulating the falling destinies of the stage. Low as these are, in literature, management, conflicting interests, and other respects, we trust that much may be done to support the last of a fine system, and keep the pervading barbarism (the result of civilisation?) from the heart of the drama yet for a period of years. The magicians of the Garrick must exert their skill to do this, even in a degree.

DRAMA.

COVENT GARDEN.

Catherine of Cleves, which had been laid aside in consequence of Mr. Kemble's long indisposition, was acted for the first time on Wednesday. This tragedy, or tragic drama (for in the play-bills it has successively received both these denominations), or melo-drama, which perhaps, after all, would be its more appropriate title, is a translation by Lord Leveson Gower from a French play by Dumas called Henri Trois, which Henri Trois is taken from the tragedy of Bussy d'Ambois, or the Husband's Revenge, by Durfey, and which Bussy d'Ambois was, again, an alteration from Chapman's play of the same name that was written more than two centuries ago, the dialogue and poetry of which Dryden visited with one of the severest castigations of his pen.

Of the production before us it is unnecessary to describe the plot in detail. We shall content ourselves, therefore, with repeating here, that it is extremely simple, and consists of three incidents, which occupy the three acts of the drama: the first comprising the interview at the astronomer's between the lovers; the second the writing of the fatal letter; and the third, the temporary escape and murder of the unfortunate St. Megrin. As a drams, then, we should pronounce it to be deficient in business, and as containing fewer good situations, and certainly inferior to the Hernani of the same author, which was brought out last season at the other theatre; and yet, at the same time. there is sufficient interest, particularly in the last two acts, to ensure Monsieur Dumas a respectable station amongst the dramatic writers of the age. As represented, it appeared to be written in smooth and easy metre, but the language not above the common level; at least as far as we could hear it (for Mr. Bennett and Mrs. Lovell, into whose hands the greater part of the dialogue of the first act fell. kept the whole of what passed pretty nearly to themselves); and the concluding lines are lame and impotent indeed - so much so, that it would be better, on future representations, that the curtain should fall with the death of the heroine.

The acting was generally good; though Miss Kemble would greatly improve the letter scene if she were to be a little more animated, and throw more force into the expression of the pain she is put to by the iron grasp of her obdurate husband. † In other respects she ap-scene, particularly that portion of it which contains the avowal of her love, and her fears for her lover's safety, with considerable power and effect. She was also splendidly attired; though ness than for taste. Mr. Kemble's St. Megrin is a clever performance, but he seems not yet quite recovered from his illness; at least this is the only way we can account for an occasional want of spirit, and "that alacrity and cheer of mind which he was wont to have.' Warde acted with his usual judgment in the imperious and haughty Duke de Guise, and made the most of a very disagreeable character. Abbot's Fop is light and pleasant; but Bennett's Ruggieri would be all the better for a little more smartness of delivery, and a some-what louder tone of voice. Miss Taylor's youthful Page was a lively, clever, and well-dressed performance. The audience, indeed, seemed to lament poor Arthur's fate more than that of any of the other sufferers. Of Mr. Mason and Mrs. Lovell, in the young King and the old Queen, as we can say nothing favourable, we shall be silent. The piece was altogether well received; for the only difference of opinion that arose amongst the audience was owing to the sudden elevation of the Count St. Megrin to a dukedom, to answer a temporary and peculiar object. The house was well filled, and amongst the crowd were many of the noble author's fashionable friends.

THE ADELPHI.

IT is of no use pretending to report upon or criticise the Adelphi. If Mrs. Yates will play Victorine, audiences must take their turn. We tried to have a (we think) fifteenth or sixteenth peep on Wednesday, but in vain; for we met so many people coming down stairs that we thought it in vain to go up. We were disappointed; but such performances deserve crowds, and we were glad to see they have them.

OLYMPIC.

A NEW burletta, by Mr. C. Dance, has been produced with great success at this theatre. Liston and Mrs. Glover have capital parts.

RAYNER's new theatre, on the site of Burford's Panorama, Strand, is to open, as we learn, on Monday next. The alterations and decorations have been achieved by Mr. Broad, the architect, in the short space of seven weeks. The arrangements are very judicious, and promise to make this one of the prettiest and most convenient theatres in London.

UNREHEARSED STAGE EFFECTS.

Covent Garden .- The pigincident mentioned in my last, like the wig incident mentioned in my first, has, in consideration of the roars it produced, been repeated nightly ever since. These things, however, always lose upon repetition that impromptu effect which constitutes their only charm. Mr. F. Sutton now runs with the pig in his arms to the stage-box, into which he tumbles it, and himself and the nabob thereafter; but it is so awkwardly managed, so palpably purposed, as never to create the excitement it did when it was an "unrehearsed stage effect."

Olympic. — Jan. 17. A huge tree tumbled into an apartment in My Great Aunts residence; and in the last scene of Olympic Devils such an incident as this would be too much, we suppose, for the delicate nerves of an audience of the nineteenth century, though perfectly in keeping with the period dramatised.

an ill-looking and nondescript piece of ma-chinery tumbled out of the clouds among the dramatis personæ. These phenomena, in both instances, led to yet greater, - namely, the extreme sang-froid with which such alarming prodigies were contemplated by the toadies in the former piece, or the fair Bacchantes in the latter. Pan danced with such energy that he at last literally danced his tail off! and shewed his indifference to his serious loss, -of which, strange to say, he was only made aware by the laughter of the audience,—by taking up his detached and important member, and throwing it among a group of nymphs! Orpheus is now determined they shall not "strangle her," for he takes hold of the water on each side of the hole in it, and grasps the liquid element in stiff puckers, a little at the expense of natural effect.

Covent Garden.—Jan. 18. In the last speech of Catherine of Cleves, Warde narrowly saved himself from one of those transpositions so fatal to the sense of the author. The line is,

Her dving breath outweighs all proof of guilt : and I naturally supposed the dying "weath," or "weth," of which the actor spoke, would "outbray" all proof, &c. He, however, thus delivered the line over the prostrate form of the heroine; his most ill-timed error not passing unnoticed by the audience:

Her dying weth breath out-weighs all proof of guilt. Miss Kemble produced rather a laughable effect with the said dying "weth-breath;" her last line being

The fond and faithful page who died to serve me. Which she altered to

The fond, the faithful child, who died to save me. Miss Taylor, as Arthur, the page alluded to, was certainly alarmingly overgrown for a child, in height, manners, and general demeanonr. When Charles Kemble, in the third act, cut off a lock of his hair with his dagger, he looked exactly as if he was shaving. I have discovered another use of the split in the green curtain at this theatre. It will always save Miss Kemble from being crushed, whenever her corpse, or any part of it, extends beyond bounds. Her hand, on the above occasion, was unhurt, though shut out in the middle of the curtain on the audience side. In A Day after the Wedding, the beautiful acting of Ellen Tree as the wife, when she relents at the sight of the old domestics who are leaving her, was rendered literally inaudible by the general and unbroken laughter excited by the as incessant wagging of the tail of an odd-looking dog which Mrs. Tayleure had brought on in her arms.

VARIETIES.

The New Monthly calls Talleyrand the Voltaire, and Chateaubriand the Rousseau, of politics; - the expression is as just as it is happy.

Revolutionary Publications. - The attention of Government and the Police is most exigently demanded by the multitude of penny and twopenny papers which now inundate the metropolis, and disseminate the most vile and revolutionary principles among the ignorant.

Robert-le-Diable. - A parody of this celebrated opera has been produced at the Theatre Montonsier, in Paris, and has met with great Progress of the Pestilential Cholera .- The cholera arrived at North Shields by three different routes. On the 10th of December from Sunderland, on the 21st from Hartley, and on the 27th from Newcastle. This pestilence, whose slow progress is one of its most remarkable phenomena, has now reached Haddington at his favourite villa of Mahazoarivo. Though south. There is, indeed, reason to believe that a sailor coming from Sunderland, by newspaper report, died of this disease at Shadwell, near Limehouse, as late as Thursday last. We cannot impress too strongly upon the local boards of health the necessity of providing hospitals for the reception of cholera patients. It affords us much satisfaction to observe the arrangements which have been made in Edinburgh for the scientific investigation of the disease. The board of health of that city has determined on an inquiry into all professional and statistical points connected with it, and for this purpose a junto of medical men has been appointed: Dr. Davidson, late President of the College of Physicians, and Mr. H. Bell, author of a recent work on cholers, are to take charge of the department of the symptoms and treatment; Dr. Alison, Professor of the Theory of Medicine in the University, and Dr. Gregory, Physician to the Infirmary, will su-perintend the directions and general department of pathological anatomy; the duty of looking after the statistical returns is devolved on Dr. Christison, Professor of Medical Jurisprudence; and the whole investigation will be superintended by Dr. Abercrombie.

The Highland Society of Scotland met on Tuesday in Edinburgh; the Duke of Buccleuch, the president, in the chair. Lady Mackenzie, of Gairloch, was elected a member without the ceremony of a ballot. Thirty-seven new members were admitted, amongst whom were the Hon. James Murray, Sir John Forbes, Sir John Gordon Sinclair, Sir Ralph Abercrombie Anstruther, and Sir John Malcolm. The honorary silver medal of the year has been awarded to the Ettrick Shepherd, for a report on the agricultural state of Selkirkshire, and a similar reward to the Earl of Mar for plantations for shelter made on his estate of Forest. - Edinhurah Journals.

Sir Walter Scott is still under quarantine at Naples .- Gazette d'Augsbourg, Dec. 27.

"Honour is the virtue of the vain." namir.

Improvement .- By the Vibilia we are pleased to observe that our Van Diemen's Land Society has received the high compliment from the Asiatic Society, of a series of its Transactions, and a valuable collection of seeds. We trust this gratifying circumstance will serve as a fillip to rouse this patriotic institution from its now seemingly dormant state. - Hobart Town Courier.

We are happy to observe that Mr. Davidson. the able superintendent of the government garden, has, through the medium of Monsieur le Capitaine de la Place, of the Favourite, established a correspondence with a scientific gentleman at Macao, for the mutual exchange of indigenous and useful plants and seeds to and from China and this colony. Such endeavours to disseminate the gifts of nature are the true channels for the exercise of philanthropy, and ought especially to be encouraged. Our government garden is indeed, we are happy to see, daily more and more acquiring the character of a generally useful and scientific horticultural establishment, and the collection of foreign and experimental plants in it is already great, - a descriptive catalogue of which we shall endeavour to give in our forthcoming annual.—Ib.

We are happy to find that the successor of Radama in Madagascar, Queen Ranavalona, is equally desirous to promote the good of her country. She has already added considerably to the collection of plants which Radama made

Irish love of Fighting. - "Some peasants belonging to opposite factions had met under peculiar circumstances; there were, however, two on one side and four on the other. In this case, there was likely to be no fight; but in order to balance the number, one of the more numerous party joined the weak side; ' bekase, boys, it would be a burnin' shame, so it would, for four to kick two; and, except I join them, by the powers, there's no chance of there being a bit of sport, or a row at all at all!' Accordingly he did join them, and the result of it was, that he and his party were victorious, — so honestly did he fight." — Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry, 2d edit.

Idem Sonans.—Lord F— married his cook: there is no accounting for lords' tastes. At the first grand dinner-party after the honevmoon, her ladyship was discomposed by the entrées not making their appearance as speedily as they ought; and she was sitting, thoughtfully, with her hands before her on the table, pondering how much quicker things would have been done had she been (as she had been) in the kitchen. At this period an Exquisité playfully exclaimed, "Horrid pause!" which her ladyship coloured deeply, and re-plied, hastily withdrawing them, "If you, sir, had worked as hard as I have done, you would have horrid paws too!"

EXAMINED.

"A book of more good sense and clearer views than the Modern Sabbath Examined, it has not been our lot often to report upon. We can say, with a perfect conviction of its trush, that when the opinions of enlightened persons like the writer prevail generally in this country, there may be expected private happiness and public prosperity. At this present moment, the ordinances of the Divine Will, and the interested regulations of political boties, whether calling themselves religious or not, are so entangled and raveiled, that it requires a man of more than ordinary perspicatly to see his way clearly between them. The style of the author is perspicuous, copious, and, in many instruous, elegant. His method is logical; and no inquirer can fail to measter the argument, who applies even endinary atomicas."—

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

Principles of Geology; being an Attempt to explain the former Changes of the Earth's Surface, &c. By Charles Lyell, Esq., F.R.S., &c. Vol. II. London, 1832. Murray.

THE Principles of Geology, from the authority of Mr. Lyell's name, but more particularly from the space that is given to their development, are assuming an imposing form, and require some examination. The second volume, now published, is entirely filled up with details of the changes of the organic world still in progress—the geographical distribution of animals—the embedding of organic remains in alluvium and in subaqueous deposits-and the formation of coral islands; and if the other parts of the subject are discussed in the same full manner, instead of two volumes, as originally intended, we shall have six - a fertility of illustration to which we should not object if we met with more method and a stricter analysis in the execution.

In the first place, we have four long chapters devoted to the consideration of whether species have any existence in nature. It certainly is a stumbling-block to modern geology, to find, buried in the crust of the earth, animals created after a different type to those now met with on the surface of the globe, and forms which give consistency to the wildest of the supposed fabulous accounts of remote antiquity. There were two ways of discussing this important question; the one, strictly geological—by pointing out the correctness, and establishing by able applications, the validity of Baron Cuvier's views on the certainty of the osteogonic laws; more especially when it is beginning to be whispered that that great fabric raised to the author's immortality, in " an art almost unknown, and which presupposed a science whose first developments had scarcely yet been traced — that of laws which regulate the co-existence of the forms of the different parts in organised beings," - is about to fall before the gradual accumulation of facts which tend to disprove the certainty of the arguments deduced from the constancy of form. Illustrations of this kind would have received additional value from an elaborate exposition of the invariable manner in which distinct species are always met with in contemporaneous formations, and that when they lose their specific characters they were the inhabitants of a different medium, or existed under different circumstances. second order of illustrations was to be derived entirely from the animal kingdom-not from the theoretical views of Lamarck, to the consideration of which the author has devoted so much space-but from the progress of comparative anatomy, the researches of Marcel de Serres, of Laurencet and Meyraut, and of Geoffroy Saint Hilaire. Opinions founded upon anatomical considerations connected with the development of the fœtus in the egg, the organisation of the lower animals, and the deviations from the normal structure observed in monsters, have been the foundation of the views of modern naturalists on unity of organisation; and the relations which it implies between organised bodies and the conditions of their existence—that is to say, the external physical agents with which they are in necessary relation, and upon which the integrity and action of their functions depend __ is a philosophy which merits the most elaborate examination, and will not bear to be lightly passed over. Had Mr. Lyell been well acquainted with the ground-work of these geological problems, he would never have asked such an unphilosophical question as, Why have not the savages of Borneo acquired, by dint of longing for many generations for the power of climbing trees, the elongated arms of the ourang, or even the prehensile tails of some monkeys?-It is always much more easy to ridicule a theory than to disprove its soundness. The gradations by which the elective affinity of organs and "the principal of connexions" reduces the organisation of the higher animals to a uniform type, are not by such extravagant concessions of structure or addition of parts as Mr. Lyell would have the uninitiated to believe.

We observe in these chapters a lengthened view of F. Cuvier's ideas upon domestication, which, in themselves unobjectionable, are so remotely connected with the subject, that it would have been sufficient if that connexion had been pointed out. The phenomena of hybrids are more remarkable as we descend in the scale of the creation; in the higher animals nature appears to have put a bar to the continuation of cross-breeds. Tiedmann's researches on the brain of the fœtus are of importance to arguments of this kind; and we could have reminded Mr. Lvell of Rathke's discoveries respecting the respiratory organs, as bearing evidence on the same point.

There are six chapters on the geographical distribution of plants and animals. The author had two objects in view - to establish the laws by which the habitations and stations of plants and animals are ordered, and the anomalous cases in which these laws are infringed; and the relations which the phenomena at present observable in the distribution of organic nature bear to those which modern science has found to exist in the successive creations buried in the crust of the globe. The materials accumulated by the laborious naturalists of the continent, and our own country, furnish data which would now allow conclusions to be made upon this most interesting subject, which would at once give some character to the study, and assert the progressive march which geological science has been making for these few years

It is quite a mistaken notion to deduce from such an investigation that the narrow limits in which so many species are now confined is caused by the remodelling of the globe, from time to time, by igneous and aqueous agents.
This can, at the best, only be applicable to seas.

which become isolated or join with others in the same manner; as, according to Bory St. Vincent, in two different infusions you have animals of distinct characters; mingle the two, and you have animals partaking of the characters neither of the one nor the other. True it is, that mysteries which natural science, as formerly studied, could never reach, have at length had much light thrown on them by philosophical anatomy and by geology, the latter of which could only inquire into the state of the animate creation as it now exists, with a view of pointing out its relations to antecedent periods, when its condition was different; and we are glad to find that Professor Lyell has not shut his eyes to the facts contained in that science of which he stands before us as the representative, and we shall wait impatiently for that body of materials amassed, as he says, by the industry of modern geologists, which have led him in modesty to suppose that, out of two millions of species, exclusive of microscopic beings, one annual birth and one annual death would effect such great changes in the animal kingdom.

If there is one part of Mr. Lvell's work that will be read with more interest than another, it is the mass of information he has accumulated upon the changes undergone on the earth's surface, in the interment of organised sub-stances, in the conversion of plants into peat and bog earth, the formation of floating islands, the burial of human remains beneath sands and land-slips---(where can there be a more striking illustration of the disappearance of towns than on the shores of the Bay of Biscay; yet why are these monuments of changes yet going on neglected?) - the embedding of organic remains in subaqueous deposits, and of aquatic species in subaqueous strata. We are rejoiced to see the excellent illustrations of the formation, &c. of coral islands given by Captain Beechey, now embodied in elementary scientific works. We cannot conceive any thing that can convey a more accurate idea of these frail gifts of the deep, to those who have not traversed the southern seas, than some of these illustrations. Supposing, with Mr. Lyell, that these islands may be all summits of volcanoes, we do not see that this renders the explanation given in the Journal of the Royal Geographical Society of London, of the horizontal elevation of the water, which protects the exposed side of the island, curving round from this starting point to leave an entrance at the opposite end, where the horizontal growth of the polypifers is not impeded _less applicable to the explanation of the actual appearance presented by these immense products of animalculate creation. The earth having been given to man as a vast patrimony, the advantage of knowing it well should not remain a privilege: and we are certain that Mr. Lyell's labours will be appreciated by a discerning public.

[·] Cuvier's Essay on the Theory of the Earth-

The Member: an Autobiography. By the Author of "the Ayrshire Legatees," &c. &c. 12mo. pp. 272. London, 1832. Fraser.

WE have here another specimen of Mr. Galt's dry humour and shrewd observation, in the doings and remarks of a Scots nabob during several sessions of Parliament in which he was "the Member" for the borough of Frailtown. Such an autobiography, it may readily be imagined, partakes more of the leaven of politics than could be congenial with our pages; and therefore we shall content ourselves with extracting only such a limited portion of the writer's opinions as may serve to afford a fair idea of the writer's talent in this small volume. The opening dedication to the celebrated and most efficient whipper-in of the Tory members, is not the worst bit of the book.

" To William Holmes, Esq. M.P.

"The Girlands, Jan. 1, 1832.

" My dear sir,-I beg leave to inscribe to you this brief memoir of my parliamentary services, and I do so on the same principle that our acquaintance, Colonel Napier, refers to as his motive in dedicating that interesting work, the History of the Peninsular War, to the Duke of Wellington. It was chiefly under your kind superintendence that I had the satisfaction of exerting myself as an independent member, really and cordially devoted to the public good, during many anxious campaigns; and now, retired for ever from the busy scene, it is natural that I should feel a certain satisfaction in associating your respected name with this humble record. If the Reform Bill passes, which an offended Providence seems, I fear, but too likely to permit, your own far more brilliant and distinguished career as a patriotic senator, is probably also drawing to a conclusion; and withdrawn, like me, to a rural retreat, in the calm repose of an evening hour, no longer liable to sudden interruption, it may serve to amuse your leisure to cast an eye over the unpretending narrative of scenes and events so intimately connected in my mind with the recollection of your talents, zeal, and genius, in what, though not generally so considered by the unthinking mass, I have long esteemed nearly the most important situation which any British subject can fill; but which, alas! is perhaps destined to pass away and be forgotten, amidst this general convulsion, so fatal to the established institutions of a once happy and contented country. If, indeed, my dear and worthy friend, the present horrid measure be carried into full effect, it is but too plain that the axe will have been laid to the root of the British oak. The upsetting, short-sighted conceit of new-fangled theorems will not long endure either the aristocratic or the monarchic branches; and your old office, so useful and necessary even under a well-regulated social system, will fall with the rest; for the sharp, dogged persons likely to be returned under the schedules, will need no remembrancer to call them to their congenial daily and nightly task of retrenchment and demolition. A melancholy vista discloses itself to all rational understandings; ... a church in tatters; a peerage humbled and degraded-no doubt, soon to be entirely got rid of; that poor, deluded man, the well-meaning William IV., probably packed off to Hanover; the three per cents down to two, at the very best of it; a graduated property-tax sapping the vitals of order in all quarters; and, no question, parliamentary grants and pensions and once, when nearly beaten, we have a neat of every description no longer held sacred! touch of his drollery. "Trust to Providence, May you be strengthened to endure with firm. and do your best," cried Mr. Tough. This what I have observed in our own parish, there London should become so disturbed as to render Fulham no more that sweet anug retirement I always considered it, sure am I, that by making my little sequestered place here your temporary abode during the raging of the storm, you would confer much real pleasure and honour on myself and family. We have capital fishing, both trout and salmon, close at hand; and the moors are well enough all about us-what with blackcock, grouse, ptarmigan, and occasionally roes, of which the duke's woods near harbour many. Here we might watch afar off the rolling of the popular billows, and the howlings of the wind of change and perturbation, and bide our time. Once more, dear Mr. Holmes, accept the sincere tribute of esteem and regard from your old friend and pupil, and humble ARCHI. JOBBRY." servant at command,

"P.S. Herewith you will receive four brace moorfowl, 2 ditto B. cocks, item three hares, one side of a roe, and one gallon whisky (véritable antique); which liberty please pardon. Jan. 2. I am credibly informed that the weavers of Guttershiels, over their cups on hogmanae and yesterday, were openly discussing the division of landed properties in this district! What have not these demented ministers to answer for ?"

We will not meddle with Mr. Jobbry's reasons for getting into Parliament-the chief of which is, to be able to make provision for his poor relations, without trenching on the fortune he has brought from India. In his negotiation he thus declares his principles :-- "Between Whigs and Tories I can make no distinction. a Tory is but a Whig in office, and a Whig but a Tory in opposition; which makes it not difficult for a conscientious man to support the government.

So pliable and acute withal, (if we may apply that term to genuine northern cunning and sagacity), Mr. Jobbry obtains his seat at a moderate cost; the history of which is characteristic and amusing;—and when in the house he confirms his political preconceptions.

"It appeared (he says), when I came to think of it, that the great cause which stirred men to be in opposition to government, was to provide for their friends and dependents; and that that was the secret reason why the Opposition found such fault with existing institutions and places, and why they put forth new plans of national improvement, which they pledged themselves, if ever they got into office, to carry into effect. Time has verified this notion. Under the pretext of instituting better official and judicature arrangements, new ones have been introduced by the Opposition when they came into power, which enabled them to provide for their friends and dependants; but they were obliged to indemnify those who enjoyed the old offices. Whether the change was an improvement or not, I would not undertake to maintain; but the alteration was very conducive to the acquisition of a new stock of patronage. With very little individual suffering, the change necessarily superseded and set aside those who did the work under the old system; but as there would have been gross injustice in turning adrift the old servants; they were provided for by an indemnification, and the new servants had all the new places to themselves over and above: in time, as the old servants died off, the evil was remedied."

Mr. Jobbry's subsequent election-contests are all described in Mr. Galt's own manner;

ness the evil day; and if the neighbourhood of shews to what desperation our cause was reduced.

In the following we have a glance at matters of greater importance, which, though put forth in a fiction, are not the less deserving of atten-

" In truth, it is a great defect in our government, that the plans of public improvement are left entirely at the discretion of their projectors, who, if they be plausible persons, soon find support enough, by which works are undertaken that supersede others of more utility, and yet afterwards prove great losses. No private bill, for improvements of any sort, should be allowed to go before the House of Commons until the importance of the improvement proposed has been certified by a board or depart. ment of government.' I said to him 'that he was very right; but it was thought that these things were best left to the freedom and discretion of those who were interested in them.' 'I would, perhaps,' said he, ' leave a good deal to that opinion; but if the business of government be the protection of property, and I can see but little use for it besides, surely it is a blameable negligence to let the nation grow rife with public projects without investigating their utility."

"'No truth can be more self-evident than that there has been a withdrawing from us of some secret thing that must have counteracted the burdens of the war. Have you any no-tion what it can be?' 'It can be no small matter, Mr. Blount, since it is equivalent in effect to millions on millions of pounds sterling. In my opinion, it can have been no less than a great sum subtracted from the money among hands, or what the political economists call a contraction of the circulating medium.' 'By Jove,' cried Mr. Blount, 'you have hit the nail on the head. The Bank has contracted its issues to a vast amount, equal to much of the reduced taxation; the country bankers are like shelled peascods, not a tithe in their notes to what they were: no bills are circulating for the munitions of war. Upon my word, Mr. Jobbry, I do think that all our evils arise from our contracted circulation.'

" One remark made by Mr. Diphthong. however, on the poor-rates, struck both me and Mr. Blount as very uncommon. 'Much,' said he, ' of this unhappy state of the country lies in a mere name; and were a little pains taken to place the matter in a proper light and ministration, a great deal of the discontent among the rural population would be appeared. There has grown up,' he continued, 'a disposition to consider all those as paupers who are employed by the parishes, as well as those who are assisted with alms by the parishes. This should be rectified.' Mr. Blount, evidently surprised to hear him say so, inquired what he meant. 'I mean,' was his reply, ' that the money raised to mend the parish roads, and to do other parish work, ought not to be included in the poor-rates; for where the parish gets work done in return for employing the labourers when work is scarce, it ought not to be considered that the wages of these labourers are alms. It would be just as equitable to call the bricklayers who are now building the new church paupers, as those poor men who are breaking stones for the improvement of the highways. And thus it is that I say the error is in a name. Why not call the fund that is made use of for parish improvements the labour fund, and keep it distinct from the poorrates? Were this done, certain am I, from would not be found any such increase of pauperism, as it has been of late years so much the fashion to enlarge upon. Indeed, I am so well convinced of this, that I do not believe the real poor-rates are at this time so great as they were at the beginning of King George the Third's reign, if the increase of population be considered ... I mean the amount paid to the aged and infirm, for whom alone they are raised."

Mr. Galt, from the mouth of this Mr. Diphthong, recommends emigration and public works as remedies: we wonder he has not added the allotment of small portions of land to the industrious poor, certainly one of the most obvious, easy, and effective boons which could be conferred on the people of Great Britain.

But, having been seduced, if not into a political, at least into a politico-economical remark, by Mr. Galt's lucubrations, we shall amend the lapse by now taking leave of them; only adding, that in a little pathetic episode respecting a family named Selby, ruined by a patriotic endeavour of the father to serve his country, and a long-protracted suit to ministers for reimbursement, we think we can recognise a real case of individual hardship, the principal party concerned in which literally died, not long since, of distress and broken-heartedness.

Le Talisman; Morosaux Choisis, inédits, de Littérature Contemporaine. A. Levavasseur et F. Astoin, Editeurs. Paris, 1832, Giraldon-Bovinet; London, Longman and Co. THE illustrations of this very pretty volume we have already praised in our mention of the English Annuals. The literary contents are very various, and possess a degree of originality and talent which may well vie with our own, and talent which may well vie with our own,— and all strongly marked by the new spirit of French literature. We will first give a free version of a lively story, written to illustrate one of the prints, and then proceed to make a few remarks on the poetry.

"In the month of September, a young man arrived from Paris at Dieppe, and took up his residence at l'Hôtel de l'Europe. He was idle, had been fortunate, and the sole object of his stay was some little adventure, some ball-room conquest, wherewith to be employed, and whereof to be vain. Well, in the hotel there lodged a lady, young, and enveloped in all the attraction of the most profound mystery. No one knew her; she went neither to the baths nor to the balls; and she had not even a servant with her to be bribed. All in the hotel were raving about her beauty, her grace, and her dignified manner. Of a night they would steal up stairs to catch the tones of her voice, for she sang exquisitely. Our young Parisian's head was completely turned. To have such a neighbour, with the face, they said, of an angel-he knew she had the voice of one, - and yet neither to be able to see her nor to speak to herit was enough to drive him wild. He bought a guitar, and composed songs where the word neighbour (voisine) served as a rhyme to the word unknown (inconnue). He sat and sang all day long, his room-door wide open, and with as much tenderness as could well be thrown into a human voice. It was quite in vainsong and guitar were equally wasted. At length he resolved on writing: the crow-quill which traversed the paper was as fine almost as the (imagined) eyelash of his mistress; a world of Cupids, grapes, vases, and roses, crowded the border of the paper; the seal was of azure blue wax, and bore a dove ready for flight. The whole staircase was perfumed as he bore the seented epistle to the servant he had paid to toilette. Five struck: he felt he was, as ever, convey it. But the letter and its half-dozen successors shared the same fate. Our Parisian was stupified with astonishment: what! had he, the utterly irresistible, remained a fortnight under the same roof with a young and pretty woman, and only learnt that she went by the name of Mde. Paul, a name which was not even supposed to be her own! Love has many stages, and the young Frenchman had arrived at one very unusual with him, viz. melancholy. One day he was roused from a disconsolate reverie by one of the servants, whom he had bribed to observe the motions of Mde. Paul, running in to inform him that she was just gone down to the quay, to see a packet which was endeavouring to enter the harbour in the teeth of a contrary wind. In an instant he was on his way to the quay. The sea was very rough. The whole town was gathered on the heights which commanded the coast, watching the vessel, which seemed, in sheer madness, forcing its way despite of the furious wind and the falling tide. The gale blew so strong, that the colossal crucifix of Notre Dame de Bon-secours bent like a hazel wand. 'Twas a gallant sight — the bold steam-boat, painted with divers colours, lighted up by one of those chance rays which struggle through the darkest skies, while the background was formed by one enormous black cloud. Now, the vessel seemed in air, as it rode the ridge of some gigantic wave; and then again seemed lost in one of those depths formed by the stormy sea -- valleys, indeed, of the shadow of death. A dense column rose, undulated like a serpent, high as the mast, and from out of it, like a tongue of flame, shone the red topgallant. ' It is the Northumberland, an American steam-boat: by Our Lady, she carries the stripes and stars aloft!' cried the captain of the port. 'Yonder is her captain, disputing with a tall man in a naval uniform. Faith! but the captain's right: it is madness to think of entering the harbour this weather. Still, his tall companion insists. How can they risk such a noble vessel!' In advance of the crowd, her feet on the wet and slippery pebbles, so near that the foam dashed in flakes of snow over her shoes, stood a female, immovable, with her eye fixed on the naval officer, whom she could distinctly see by means of a small telescope. Her deep mourning told the Parisian it was his unknown. To catch sight of her face, he went knee-deep in the water: he stood directly before her; but, so intent was her gaze on the approaching vessel, that she saw him not. Suddenly a dark shadow fell over him; a loud cry from the spectators warned him of his danger; the next moment a gigantic wave burst over his head. He sank, struggled, rose, and, dizzy and dripping, scrambled to the shore, amid the laughter which his safety ensured. The first thing he saw was the beautiful unknown laughing too. He cast upon her a look of bitter reproach. She extended her hand to him.

'Ah, how I blame myself!' said she, in a low sweet voice: 'it is for my sake you came, did you not? do forgive me.' Our young Parisian now was fairly out of his senses. At this moment a general shout announced that the steamboat had tacked: away she bounded from the shore, like a sea-bird over the waters. 'Ah!' said Mde. Paul, with a deep-drawn breath, and a peculiar expression of countenance, ' so much the better. I do not (turning to her companion) ask if you love me _ I know it _ I am sure of it. Come at five o'clock to my room: I will order dinner for two. Do not fail: I must speak to you: to-morrow it will be too late.'
From that time till five o'clock he was at his irresistible, and he hurried to his appointment. She was singing a wild sweet song as he entered; and her back turned to the door, gave him an opportunity of observing, as she leant over her guitar, the most exquisite shoulders and the prettiest-shaped head in the world, She rose with such graceful confusion, and her long evelashes fell over black eves - black as Gulnare's when their light wakened the slumbers of the Pirate. She was now drest in white, her rich dark hair was gathered up by combs of gold, her girdle was of gold also, and so were the massive bracelets on her arm, whose symmetry a sculptor might have modelled. They sat down to dinner, and all embarrasement floated away on the champagne: coffee, liqueurs, and confidence, came together. 'My name is Allegra,' said the beautiful stranger: 'I was born at Naples, and the re-volution which deprived Murat of his crown, deprived my father, also, of his country. He fled to America, carrying with him, however, the best part of his wealth, which, from his solitary habits, accumulated from year to year. As my evil fate would have it, when on the verge of womanhood, he formed an acquaint-ance with a young Englishman, Sir George Walsingham, who soon acquired unbounded influence over him. My father died—God for-give my suspicions if unjust—but his death was strange and sudden. On opening his will, it was found that all his property was left to me_but on condition that I married Sir George Walsingham, who otherwise inherited, to my exclusion. I implored his mercy; told him I never could return his affection; and at last, finding refusals and reproaches in vain, I fled hither with what money and jewels I had. Alas, even here he has pursued me! Sir George Walsingham was the officer who urged the Northumberland to the dangerous trial of to-day: in a few hours he will be here; he will claim me as his wife, and I have no resource. Will you save me from a fate more horrible than death?' 'With my life; only tell me what to do,' said Eugene, gazing on a face lovely as a dream. You must stay here: I will go to meet him, and be the first to propose a reconciliation. We will send for the priest, who will marry us.' 'Marry you and Sir George?' 'Yes; you will follow us to church, and as we come out you will kill him.'

'Kill him?' 'Well?' 'But it will be an absolute murder-an assassination.' 'Murder and him! it is a justice—a duty; are you a coward?' She sprang to her feet,-the veins darkened on her white brow, her cheek colouring crimson, and her eyes flashing, as if she at said the Parisian, pale with contending passions, 'what needs this marriage?' 'What? let him revel in my father's wealth, which I can only inherit as his widow?' He caught the carnest gaze of her large bright eves, the plead. ing of her beautiful mouth, the sweetness of whose breath was even on his cheek;—he caught her small white hands, and swore upon them to do her will. 'You must leave me now,' said she; 'it is late.' She led him to the door; and as it closed, he again met those radiant eyes, and surely love was in their long and lingering look. That night the hotel was disturbed by an arrival. The wind had changed, and the packet entered the harbour. Next morning he learnt that Sir George Walsingham had come; he learnt, too, that orders had been sent to prepare the chapel for a marriage. In vain he sought another interview with Allegra. A carriage at length drove up looking man, Allegra was borne to the vehicle; Eugene followed it, and arrived just as the ceremony was concluding. Sir George held his victim by the arm, and fixed his fierce eye upon her with a cold and cruel expression; she was almost hidden by her veil; but she was trembling, and the little of her face that could be seen was white as the marble of the monu-ments around. The ceremony was at an end, and they left the chapel. Instantly the young Parisian sprang forward, and struck the bride-groom on the face. 'Liar, murderer, and coward !-do you dare follow me ?' The Englishman started, and then struck him in return. 'For life or for death-yours or mine!' cried Eugene, offering him one of two pistols. They retreated a few paces, fired, and both fell-Sir George shot through the heart-the Parisian dangerously wounded. He was carried to his hotel, where he lay for some hours insensible. At length he was able to speak. His last recollection was of seeing Allegra faint-Where ing in the arms of the attendants. is she?' exclaimed he, looking round the room eagerly. 'Who, sir?' 'Allegra—Lady Walsingham—Madame Paul.' 'Your neighbour?' 'Yes; where is she?' 'She left the town some hours since.' 'Gone?' and he sank back ou his pillow. No message had been left—no trace of her could be discovered; but one of the servants brought him a locket he well remembered seeing her wear, hung to a hair chain, round her neck that fatal evening. It opened with a spring, and contained the miniature of a singularly handsome young man; but it was neither Sir George's likeness nor his own!"

We have said that the poetry is very characteristic of the present spirit of French literature: it is enthusiastic, fresh, touched with the love of solitude and of scenery, and as different from the old school of neat antithesis, elegant point, and graceful compliment, as is well possible. Exaggeration is now the sin chiefly to be deprecated, and good taste the requisite principally to be studied. Among those pieces with which we have been especially pleased, we must mention Corinne Aimée, by Delphine Gay, now Mad. Emile de Giradin. The last line, where she concludes the contrast, is a beautiful idea :

We dare believe in happiness Bought by so many tears.

We also like Reproches and Solitude, by Mdle. Marie Nodier Mennisier. A un Voyageur, by Victor Hugo, is as touching as it is original: and as a whole we recommend this little volume.

The Solitary: a Poem. By Charles Whitehead. 8vo. pp. 87. London, 1831. Wilson. WE take great shame to ourselves that these pages should furnish matter for review in 1832. "Oh, fallen mid evil tongues and evil days!" well may the poet exclaim, when a work of great thought and beauty remains unnoticed in a journal whose effort, at least, is to cater as much as possible for the public gratification. The truth is, and we ask our author's indulgence when we make the acknowledgment, that this volume deserves to have been reviewed months ago. We must mention one or two elucidatory facts, the more as they bear upon the present state of literature. No one, either in writing or speaking, now-a-days, denies that poetry is fast falling from its former " palmy state:" a publisher turns a deaf ear to a poetical speculation; yet the numbers of published poems are enormous. What are we to do with the hundreds of hotpressed tomes that annually is its resemblance in form and rhythm to Childe opening gave her a glimpse of Evelyn; but re-to the door. Supported by a tall, dark, stern-|appear but to disappear? Our columns are crowded with matters of great and temporary interest; and we dislike giving the ill-natured attraction of abuse. What are we to do, but take the course we actually follow? - praise where we can, and allow the generality to stand over in good-natured silence. Now, Mr. Whitehead's poem was perchance put aside; but, in giving its companions a second look, as is our rule before final dismission, we were struck with the thoughtful beauty which pervades the Solitary. Its fault is, that it wants plan; still, it is the reverie of one with an eye open to the beauties of nature, and with many elevated and touching chords of feeling. We proceed to justify our praise by extract.

And now the moon, bursting her watery prison, Heaves her full orb into the azure clear, Heaves ner full orb into the azure clear, Pale witness, from the slumbering sea nowrisen, To glorify the landscape far and near, All beauteous things more beautiful appear; The sky-crowned summit of the mountain gleams (Smote by the star-point of the mountain gleans (Smote by the star-point of her glittering spear)

More steadfastly, and all the valley seems

Strewn with a softer light, the atmosphere of dreams!

How still as though Silence herself were dead,
And her wan ghost were floating in the air;
The moon glides o'er the heaven with printless tread,
And to her far-off frontier doth repair;
O'er-wearied lids are closing every where;
All living things that own the touch of sicep
Are beckoned, as the wasting moments wear,
Till, one by one, in valley or from steep,
Unto their several homes they and their shadows creep.

And all at length are gone; the dew impearled Is hanging on the flower and on the grass,
That when from out the dream-girt under-world The fairy train to their light measures pass, Each lady-elf may find a looking-glass, To bind her hair and smooth her tiny brow;

The moonlight is up-gathered in a mass,
Nor moves upon the waveless water now,
The aspen-leaf scarce stirs upon the stirless bough."

The following were

" Pleasant place, in sooth, for summer reverie." reasant place, in sooth, for summer reverte."

Laid at the foot of some old tree, whose boughs, Lcaf-laden, bent, their softened shadows wed
In the clear water, on whose surface ploughs
His venturous way the midge, with trailing thread;
The dusky-spotted moth, his wings half spread,
Gers H. ging drowsliy across the mere,
The Druid echo slumbers over head,
A shrunk leaf wayers down unfinely sere.

A shrunk leaf wavers down untimely sere, No sound that silence hears but the rapt senses hear."

With the exception of the conceit of "freezing the soul into a heavenly glow," the description of a poet is imbued with the spirit of one. " His youth is as a vision wrought in air,

His youth is as a vision wrought in air,
A noontide palace painted in the sun,
Resort of all the million creatures fair,
Minions of fancy, which continuous run
From the brain's crucible wherein they are spun: Beauty with vestal eyes, pure as a nun, Love that doth make eternity his theme, And friendship still unchanged in life's aye-changing stream.

His poesy is as a vessel manned
By love, impelled by strength, or Cupid's bow
Drawn by the strong unerring Pythian's hand;
Or like th' unquarried marble, by a blow
Dealt with the fervid force of Angelo,
Struck into life, which, placed in some vast hall,
Freezes the soul into a heavenly glow,
Chastening the air around its pedestal
That it with tongueless echoes may no longer brawl. His hand lets loose the whirlwind, or subdue His hand lets loose the whirlwind, or subdues
And smoothes the ocean till its rage be still,
Caparisons the clouds in gorgeous hues
Of heaven, and bids the giddy air fuifil, Unmurnuring, all the impulse of his will;
His spirit breathes through flower and trampled weed,
And puts a voice into the empty rill,
Or dallies with the dew-drop's watery bead,
Hanging upon the thorn, a light-encircled seed. No doubt invests him yet, nor the dim dread No doubt invests him yet, nor the dim dread Of something felt too soon, though ne'er exprest; But a faint halo shrines his radiant head, A laurel shade, and with undoubting breast He holds his course, unshackled, unpossest; As the maned lion walks the desert, free, Startling the morn, untired as, when in quest Of some new shore, th' irrevocable sea Rolls on where cleaving prow may never hope to be."

Harold, which has evidently been the author's model: he had far better imitate and trust to himself. Let your own mind, and no other, fling its shadow on the page-is the best parting advice we can give to any poet.

Norman Abbey; a Tale of Sherwood Forest. By a Lady. 3 vols. 12mo. London, 1832. Cochrane and Co.

In the earlier pages of these volumes occurs the following note:- "Beneath, in a vault, is interred the body of Richard Lord Byron, who, with the rest of his family, being seven brothers, faithfully served King Charles the First in the Civil Wars; who suffered much for their loyalty, and lost all their present fortunes; yet it pleased God so to bless the honest endeavours of the said Richard Lord Byron, that he re-purchased part of their ancient inheritance, which he left to his posterity with a laudable memory for his great piety and charity." Now this note having as little connexion as possible with the ensuing story, we believe we are not far wrong in the conclusion, that it is inserted by way of a hint. The work in reality is of the present time, but masquerading in that of Charles II. For Norman Abbey read Newstead Abbey; for Evelyn de Fontayne read Lord Byron, -and we have the key to the mysteries of Sherwood Forest. The most important feature in the narrative is "the young lord's boyish attachment" to a fair relative, who, however, bestows her heart and hand upon another; in short, exactly the history of Lord Byron's early love for Miss Chaworth. Parts of this work indicate talent; some of the dialogues are carried on with much spirit; and some of the characters, Lady Rachel for example, are sketched with considerable tact. But the story itself is somewhat purposeless; we are continually in expectation of horrors which do not happen, and of crimes which are never committed; and there are too many gloomy passages which lead to no-thing. We quote one or two which best serve to mark the identity of the hero.

"Agitated as Lord Fontayne was by the tumult of youthful passions, and bent on a desperate mission, he could not help pausing upon the brow of a rising hill to cast an admiring glance upon his paternal inheritance, with a very pardonable degree of self-exultation. 'It is but a wee bit of barren land!' said he; 'a poor ruin ! - a picturesque grouping of crumb. ling stone and mortar; and that smooth lake no better than a looking-glass for the use of the old Abbey, when she dresses her gray head with garlands of fresh ivy, and wimples herself out with those fantastic towers. Yet, I would not exchange it, and its mantle of green woods. for the finest castle and richest barony in the three kingdoms. It is not for money I care, continued he, looking towards Ravenstede; but these fair lands should never be parted. With feelings like these Evelyn passed over the rustic bridge, which formed a rude boundary betwixt the contiguous estates, and walked on till he reached the churchyard we have before described. Carefully unlatching the little wicket. gate, he stole into the shrubbery, and discerned through an opening arch of evergreens, that the young heiress was in the act of ascending the stone steps, with the intention of taking the same path by which he had entered. A light basket of osier hung upon her arm, in which she was accustomed to carry daily alms to such of her village pensioners as were disabled by sickness, or old age, from attendance at the The great obstacle to this poem's popularity ball. She started back a few paces, as the covering herself instantly, she advanced to meet him with her accustomed gaiety and freedom.

'My dear cousin,' said she, after a few minutes' conversation on idle topics, 'what is the matter? You look pale and anxious. Why do we not see you here as formerly? I have a sincere regard for you, and surely we can be friends, if not—' 'Lovers! I suppose you would say?' interrupted Evelyn, in a saddened accent. 'Are you still so resolute—so determined. mined to crush all my hopes, Bertha? You think me only a boy! - Well, be it so. That is a fault of no long standing, yet it will not see my love out. Would to Heaven it were the only obstacle! How cheerily would pass the heavy-footed hours! What a stimulus should I have for every laudable exertion! How I would wait for you - watch over you - pray for you!' 'But you forget, dear Evelyn,' cried Bertha, interrupting him, and blushing as she spoke, 'that I love another! — O! so much, it is impossible for me to—' 'But did you always love that other better than me, Bertha?' said Evelyn."

The following letter is written to his sister after his youthful mistress's marriage.

"You know the history of my first unhappy love. It was only a short time before I left town that I met the dear tormenting object of my early vows. We had never met since her marriage, for I had made it a point to avoid every place of amusement where I was likely to meet her. Chance, however, threw me in contact with her husband, who, unconscious of a tenderer sentiment lurking in my bosom than what the laws of consanguinity warranted, rallied me unmercifully upon my neglect of my fair cousin. Whether it was the effect of his satire, or a secret inclination once more to behold Bertha, in the hope of dispelling the illusion which still hung over my imagination, I cannot say. Certain it is, that in a proud fit of desperation I accepted Courtenay's invitation to join a numerous and splendid assembly held at his house. Ah! Isidora, how much had I miscalculated upon the strength of offended pride! On entering the magnificent saloon, all my artificial courage deserted me, and my nerves, wound up to a pitch of much enduring hardihood, became, in one instant, unstrung: — the pompous announcement of my name, re-echoed by that never-to-be-forgotten voice! the inquisitive glance of the gorgeous assembly, (all of whom I foolishly imagined knew of my disappointment, and read it in my eyes!)—O! I can never forget the horror of that moment! Bertha, instead of looking grave and matronly, as I expected, seemed to have grown still more attractive and lively. Her charms were more matured, and she had lost that attenuated look, which, in evening costume, is always a draw-back from the perfect elegance of a slight figure. Fortunately, we were not thrown together; yet our eyes often met; and mine, I fear, were sad telltales. I was dull and melancholy, cold and abstracted, rarely entering into conversation, and dealing out my brief answers to the common-place questions addressed to me with a distant and measured civility. Bertha, on the contrary, presented the joyous aspect of a happy, unsuspecting wife; although her husband's attentions, occasionally directed towards herself, were more generally bestowed upon a person, who, by her familiar and caressing manners towards Bertha, appeared to insinuate herself into the good graces of the latter. I did not like this woman's countenance and deportment, Isidora. There was something marked and premeditated about her altogether. Her dress facts, and abound in illustrations; and that a larches, on the other hand, are found to have was plain, to the extreme of singularity; her manners uniformly courteous and unobtrusive. She never looked direct at the person she addressed, and when obliged to deliver an opinion, there was a sort of deferential manner, mingled with a retreating calmness of deportment, which forbad a nearer approach to her sentiments, and left you in doubt as to her genuine feelings. Her profession, in short, seemed to be that of a ready listener, rather than a free talker. Blame me not for undue severity, ma belle sœur, if I set down these qualities for bad in a person of decidedly good rank, and of a privileged age. I hate, in the first place, to see people afraid of committing themselves by a harmless solecism, cunningly leaving every inch of folly-ground to be trodden over by a set of goodnatured, thoughtless devils, whilst they amuse themselves by laughing at them in their sleeve! The woman's courtesy too, Isidora, was not the offspring of benevolence, for there was a devilish sneer in her countenance, which made me shudder. Then as to her dress, there was the very refinement of coquetry in its arrangement; it seemed at once to blind superficial observers by its apparent negligence, as well as to set forth to advantage the charms of a voluptuous person. I did not join the female party till a late hour, and here another mortification awaited me. Bertha's first-born and darling child was struggling in the arms of this female Machiavel, (as must call her), at the moment of my entrance. I gave aminvoluntary start, as if the existence of such a being had never been suggested to my mind's eye. The lovely child unconsciously increased my discomfiture by tottering towards me. By a simultaneous impulse I held my arms out to receive it, imprinting upon its soft cheek a warm and fervent kiss. As I turned my eyes upward, I saw the light grey eyes of the aforesaid lady directing the observation of mine host to this truly dramatic scene. Stung to the quick, I hurried away as soon as possible, with a determination never to throw myself into a similar situation, and with a painful presentiment that Bertha's domestic happiness is on the wane. Confound all busy-bodies, female counsellors, and confidential spies!"

What with its personalities, its mystifications, and the interest attached to every thing about Lord Byron, the present production is likely to excite considerable curiosity.

The Botanic Annual. General Principles. Conifera. London, 1832. Cochrane and Co. BOTANY is a pursuit that is beautiful and accessible-a record of seasons and events; for, to use the words of the lamented Ramond, "the memory of how many springs is contained in the sight of a single violet." It is a picture of the surface of the earth, and presents a source of contemplative enjoyment, and of a calm and sweet poetical feeling, that is not to be found in the unruly passions of mankind. So anxious are we for the promotion of all those branches of knowledge which are instructive, and of the same unobjectionable and never-failing interest as the history of plants, from the seedling that lives in the spray of the cataract, to the tall palm that baffles the whirlwind of the desert, that our feelings go along with an undertaking like the one before us; and nothing but expectations not only damped but altogether destroyed, could stir us into an angry mood.

We shall say nothing about the author's "general principles:" he has in them indulged in some animadversions on book-making; and we should be inclined to tell him it is quite a mistake to imagine that, to be popular, we must omit writer becomes even tedious, which is quite antipopular, when he deals in reflections which are tinctured with any thing like a sour or bitter spirit. Fie! botany teaches better; it is a science of beauty and of sympathy; no one who could discern the harmony contained in the varied forms of the vegetable world, would ever harbour an evil thought against his fellowcreatures. We shall, therefore, turn at once to the monograph of the Conifera, for so we call this essay on a most useful and most noble tribe of plants. We were perfectly certain, that if popular works on botany ever came into circulation in this country, the natural system would be found the only one adapted at once to immediate comprehension, and capable of striking illustration. What could be more captivating than being led from the barren rocks of the north, the dwelling-place of the bear and the capercailzie, to the line of eternal snows on the Alps and Pyrenees-to the forests of spruce of the table-land of Mexico, and the groves of Chinafrom the cedar that grows on Lebanon, to the cypress that waves over our neglected tomb? It has been remarked, that it is not quite clear why the tall pyramidal evergreen and almost everlasting cypress should be selected by the ancients as the emblem of death, or rather of eternal sleep, and planted round their sepulcires. The former roots in mother Earth-its bouy rising naked from the grave, and its tall spiral head pointing to heaven in youthful verdure after the extinction of sixty generations, would rather indicate the Christian's hope of "life everlasting," than the heathen's creed of final annihilation.-But we are forgetting our author. The Conifers are among the most important of natural families in an economical point of view; their long branchless stems affording excellent materials for carpenter's work, and their various products being highly useful for numerous purposes. Some species, as the Pinus Lambertiana - not named, on account of its size, after Daniel Lambert, but after the worthy President of the Linnean Society - are said to attain a height of 200 feet or more. Our author has neglected to notice the beautiful harmony between the radiated arrangement of the branches, and the peculiar structure of the leaves and petioles, necessitated by alpine habitats, where they are exposed to winds which, if met with the resistance of an expanded branch and flat leaves, could never grow on the mountain-side. The Swiss have, from this fact, given them the name of "Abrite orage." Yellow deal, which is the most valued, orage." Yellow deal, which is the most valued, is the wood of the silver fir; white deal of the spruce fir. The Scotch fir, the only species of the fir tribe which is native of Great Britain, yields turpentine, pitch, tar, and rosin. Pine forests are in few places more striking than in the Landes of Bourdeaux. Their still and unfrequented recesses are haunted by birds and animals that avoid the broad glare of day-light; and the wanderer, when he penetrates into their shady labyrinths, is often almost imperceptibly lost in the gloomy silence of these vast pignadas. The Araucarias comprise the Chili pine, and the pines of Brazil, of Moreton Bay, and of Norfolk Island. It is certainly very curious to see so well-defined and rather singular a genus of plants ranged round the parallel of nearly the southern tropic, and at such wide distances from one another. The Dammaras are found in a similarly limited locality, at the extremities of the line, some three thousand miles in length, lying from north-west to south-east, along the Indian ocean, in the same hemisphere as the Araucarias. The spruces, the pines, and the formerly existed in some of their varieties on time for parley, the case spoke for itself; nor all the ridges of mountains in the northern hedid Gaetano, though ignorant of Giovanni's misphere, while others cover or have covered sandy or swampy tracts. There are only two species of cedar - that of India, and the cedar of Lebanon, the emblem of prosperity, majesty, strength, and duration, to which the bards of Israel have given immortality, and around which hang so many reverential and sublime recollections. We leave the consideration of these noble specimens of the vegetable creation -characteristic of the forest scenery of so many regions of the world-to the able pen of the author; recommending all who are in search of amusement and instruction to see how graceful even science looks in such a gay dress and so luxurious a home.

Probation, and other Tales. By the Author of "Selwyn in search of a Daughter," "Tales of the Moors," &c. 8vo. pp. 473. London, 1832, Longman and Co.; Edinburgh, Adam Black.

A VERY pleasant volume. The first tale, quite a romance of real life, is both the longest and the best, but ill adapted for the purposes of quotation; — a very picturesque little Italian story, with which the book concludes, better suits our columns as a specimen. We must abridge its commencement; and merely state, that a love-quarrel induced an Italian peasant to enlist in the French army, and that a reconciliation has induced him to desert. He bids adieu to the French army on the receipt of "a billet, which Lucia, not choosing to trust the village scribe with her secrets, contrived to get written, by whom think you? but by the youthful farmer of Rocca di Papa, the rival, but thoroughly generous and disinterested one, of her long-betrothed Gaetano. She told him in plain terms, that were any thing to befal her lover, or were he ever to cross the, to her, insurmountable barrier of the Appennines, (the Alps she had never thought of,) she would either die or go into a nunnery, which was in his eyes pretty much the same thing. So Giovanni relented, and, like a true knight of old, did his lady's bidding, come of his own love what might. The letter advised (and the advice was, in the true spirit of heroism, dictated by Giovanni himself,) strict and patient concealment in some of the villages nearest the Neapolitan frontier, till pursuit should subside, and the corps he had deserted be fairly on its march to France, then - wrote Lucia's really friendly amanuensis-he might freely return to Castel Gandolfo, and claim his bride as the reward of his obedience. The billet reached our recruit after a hot fatiguing drill, dispirited by his own awkwardness, maddened with camp jests on it—in short, just in a mood to obey all except the sensible part of its injunctions. He waited impatiently for twilight, as, in his soldier's garb, escape by day was impossible; and no sooner had the Ave Maria sounded, and the watch been relieved on the ramparts of St. Angelo, than he glided unperceived from his file amid the retiring guard, and threading precipitately each narrow vicolo between the Ponte Sisto and the Lateran, gained the gate of St. John, and left the Eternal city behind him.

The distant clatter of hoofs, an unusual sound on the rugged and sequestered road he was travelling, roused him to a sense of danger, acute in proportion to his former security; and instinctively apprehending pursuers in the unknown horsemen, he hailed with transport the sight of a market-cart half filled with straw, and driven by his ancient acquaintance and rival, farmer Giovanni M.

disinterested conduct as Lucia's amanuensis, for a moment suspect him of betraying even a rival, to French gendarmes. In the twinkling of an eye he was deep embedded in the long maize straw, and Giovanni stretched above him, as if half asleep, with real Italian quick-ness and well-dissembled apathy. No clown of Italian comedy ever received with more genuine stolidity of aspect the inquiries of Messieurs les gendarmes after their refractory conscript, than Giovanni; and what answer he chose to give, he enveloped so mysteriously in the gergo or patois of the mountains, that better linguists than those of the great nation might have been at fault. There was nothing (so the gendarmes opined) to be made of this sleepy-headed, unideal, tongue-tied peasant; so, wheeling their horses with an air of derision, they regained the high road, leaving the two rivals jogging prosperously towards the domicile of Giovanni a few miles off, at Rocca di Papa. But this abode of peace and industry poor Giovanni was never destined to reach. Ere Gaetano (whom his kind rival took care by his weight to keep in order while danger of surprise from the sol diery remained) could lift up his head to pour out his thanks to one whom he began to think quite as worthy of Lucia as himself, it was forcibly pushed down again, as a fresh cause of alarm presented itself in the appearance of considerable party of brigands, whom the vicinity of the gendarmes had kept skulking half the day, till their departure left the field open to a deed of meditated villany. It is not often that Italians and equals have to dread the predatory outrages of native robbers. But Giovanni, alas! was rich, and as such, an enemy to brigands; and he was known that very day to have sold produce at a fair, to an amoun which made his plunder an object too tempting to be resisted by those, whose foreign sources of rapine the French had pretty well dried up. Poor Giovanni, on the appearance of the party had no fears but for his comrade's detection and prevented him so effectually from peeping out to see what was the matter, that the dagger of the leader (as he leant in familiar converse against the side of the waggon,) was buried in his own unsuspecting heart, ere one movemen could be made by Gaetano for his rescue. A deep groan from his generous protector, and the muttered imprecations of the banditti, saved him the risk of fruitless exposure to ascertain the catastrophe; nor could he now, singlehanded, against a dozen armed men, earn even at any risk, the present pleasure of aven-ging him. He lay stiller, therefore, than ever, half afraid to breathe, lest by scaring the robbers he should miss the opportunity of consigning to justice, either now or hereafter, the murderers of the kind-hearted Giovanni The body, after being rudely pulled out of the cart and rifled, was as rudely cast in again; and to Gaetano's secret joy, the plan agreed on by the robbers was to drive the waggon forward towards its destination, consigning it to the first peasant they should meet, with a cockand-bull story of their having found its owner already murdered on the road. Before starting, they buried, in case of accidents, the booty in a spot which Gaetano durst not rise him self sufficiently to ascertain. But luckily the captain, fond of dress, as brigands usually are, took a fancy to a gay Paris handkerchief which had ornamented the poor farmer's vest for the fair; and snatching it rudely and yet blood-stained from his neck, thrust it into his own

This manguvre Gaetano distinctly saw, and a providential peep it was for the purposes of justice. The band now separated; but before their dispersion, drew lots who was to efficiate as driver of the abandoned waggon. The let fell on the assassin (a vine-dresser of La Riccia), who, looking as if he did not half like the job, sullenly exchanged his gay captain's habit (carefully retaining the handkerchief, however) for one of the coarse peasant frocks which so often and conveniently transform a mest of banditti into a set of peaceful ordinary looking pea-The waggon at length set forward, santry. and had not proceeded far, when, to the almost equal horror of the robber and Gaetano, their cars were saluted with a wanton incautious shet from one of the dispersing band, meant probably as a signal to his concealed wife, or expecting brood of robber imps, but which the recent vicinity of the gendarmes rendered little short of madness. Their mutual forebodings, all uncommunicated as they were, the event soon realised. The gendarmes had lingered in the neighbourhood, with the view of foraging for refreshments, at a cottage within hearing of the report. Powder, as French soldiers nationally reasoned, was not burnt for nothing; so up they leaped in their saddles, and throwing the old crone who had fed them (as savages propitiate demons through fear) more bajocchi than she had ever seen in her life, galloped back in the direction of the shot. Sacre !' exclaimed the one who came up first, in a tone of more subdued horror than had often issued from his lips, 'what have we here?' The rustic was stupid enough, heaven knows, and obstinate besides; but that's no reason why he should be murdered in broad day, and with a 'How came French police in the country too. this about, 'tother clodpole, hey? and tell us what hand you had in it?' 'Io!!!' ejaculated the really trembling robber, throwing up his eyes as if he had never handled stilette in his life, 'Madre di Dio!' (kiming an image of the Virgin, which had got entangled among the very folds of the bloody handkerchief) 'I murder any one! a countryman especially, and a buon' anima come quella.' 'I don's think his goodness would have much share in hindering you,' muttered the gendarme, 'nor your's either. There's mischief in your eye, in spite of your saints and images : give a better account of yourself and this business, else, ven trebleu, you must to the corps de garde.' wily assassin, now more on his guard, was just beginning a tissue of alaborate falsehoods, when Gaetano, unable, even at the risk of his life, to forego avenging his preserver by denouncing his murderer, started bold upright among the straw, to the equal astonishment of all parties: and totally regardless of his own jeopardy, detailed in animated language his obligations to the deceased, and his instantaneous and cowardly murder by the assassin now before them. The stamp of truth was too legible on all he said to be doubted. Men do not peril their lives on gratuitous falsehoods, and no deserter was as yet known to have escaped under the inflexible French régime. The murderer would have yet denied and equivocated; but the handkerchief, the bloody trophy on which reposed the profaned image of his heavenly patroness spoke volumes against him. So, his hands safely tied behind him with that very handkerchief, and bound down with the gladly lent sashes of the two gendarmes, it was ere long his turn to take in the cart the place of the temporarily released Gaetano; who, mounted behind one of the friendly troopers, felt, in the consciousness There was no bosom till a fitter opportunity for display. of honest feelings and disinterested conduct, a lightness of spirit which his associates did their thod of prostrating at prayer, daily touched the best to sustain. 'Courage! mon ami!' said ground. The body is then wrapped neatly in one: 'si tu es fusille, ce n'est pas grande chose!' Bah, cried the other, 'en fusillera plutôt ce been written particular chapters from the Khocoquin de brigand, ce sera tout de même.' But raun: this done, it is taken up with great shot, somehow, Gaetane felt he should not be; for Laucia he was sure would die, and nobody could have a hand in any thing so dreadful. Luckily for him, the commanding officer at La Riccia was young and romantic; the gendarmes magnified the few bold words of their prisoner into a bona-fide capture of the noted leader of banditti. Lucia was sent for opportunely, to plead with the loveliest black eyes that ever swam glittering in tears,-the corps had fortunately marched without its recruit on distant service: -- so, thanks to a kind Providence - Gaetano was not shot, but married; and instead of a sad and sorry soldier, was allowed to become a glad and grateful bride-groom.'

These pages have quite merit enough in themselves to find favour with their readers: but it must add to their interest, that the present work is one of charity, it being destined to relieve distress and penury. We cannot but give our cordial wishes to talents so well empleyed.

Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali's Observations on the Mussulmauns of India. [Second Notice.]

WE do not intend to exhaust this publication; but we trust that a few weekly extracts from it will not only please our readers, especially those who cannot for a while procure the work, but shew, that to a female pen, after all, we are most indebted for descriptions of the interior effects and domestic practices of the religion of Mahomet.

"The Mussulmauns' Creed, of the Sheah sect, is as follows :-- I believe in one God, supreme over all, and him alone do I worship. I believe that Mahumud was the creature of God, the Creator; I believe that Mahumud was the messenger of God (the Lord of messengers), and that he was the last of the prophets.

I believe that Ali was the chief of the faithful, the head of all the inheritors of the law, and the true leader appointed of God; consequently to be obeyed by the faithful. Also, I believe that Hasan and Hosein, the sons of Ali, and Ali son of Hosein, and Mahumud son of Ali, and Jaufur son of Mahumud, and Moosa son of Jaufur, and Ali son of Moosa, and Mahumud son of Ali, and Ali son of Mahumud, and Hasan son of Ali, and Mhidhie (the standing proof) son of Hasan-the mercy of God be upon them !-these were the true leaders of the faithful; and the proof of God was conveyed by them to the people.' This creed is taught to the children of both sexes in Mussulmaun families as soon as they are able to talk; and, from the daily repetition, is perfectly familiar to them at an early age. I propose describing the funeral service here, as the substance of their particular faith is so intimately connected with the appointed service for the dead. The dead body of a Musulmaun, in about six hours after life is extinct, is placed in a kuffin (coffin) and conveyed to the place of burial, with parade suited to the rank he held in life. A tent, or the kaanaut (screen), is pitched in a convenient place, where water is available near to the tomb, for the purpose of the musulmauns may have the reply ready for that awhil moment, they have a custom of repeating the washing and preparing the dead body for interment. They then take the corpse out of the soffin and thoroughly bathe it; when dry, they rub pounded camphor on the hands, feet, knees, and forehead—these parts having, in the memiliar to them at an early age. I propose dea winding sheet of white calico, on which has gentleness and laid in the grave on the side. with the face turned towards Mecca. The officiating Maulvee steps solemnly into the grave (which is much deeper and wider than ours), and with a loud voice repeats the creed, as before described; after which he says, 'These were thy good and holy leaders, O son of Adam! (here he repeats the person's names). Now, when the two angels come unto thee, who are the Maccurrub+ (messengers) from thy great and mighty God, they will ask of thee, 'Who is the Lord? Who is thy prophet? What is is thy Lord? Who is thy prophet? What is thy faith? Which is thy book? Where is thy Kiblash? Who is thy leader?' Then shalt thou answer the Maccurrub thus: 'God. greatest in glory, is my only Lord, Mahumud my prophet, Islaaim my faith (Islaaim means true faith), the Khoraun my book, the Kaubah (Holy House at Mecca) my Kiblaah...

Emaum Ali, son of Aboutalib. Hasan and Hosein. [dene. surnamed Zynool Auber-Ali. Mahumud. Baakur, Jaufur, Saadick. Moosa. Khazim, Reezah, Ali, Mahumud, Ul Jawaad. Ali, Ul Hoodah, Hasan Ul Ushkeree, Mhidhie, the standing proof that we are waiting for.

These are all my leaders, and they are my intercessors with them is my love, with their enemies is my hatred, in the world of earth and in the world to come eternal.' Then the Maulvee says: 'Know ye for a truth, O man! (repeating his name,) that the God we worship is one only, great and glorious, most high and mighty God, who is above all lords, the only true God. Know ye, also, that Mahumud is the best of the Lord's messengers ;--that Ali and his successors (before enumerated, but always here repeated) were the best of all leaders :- that whatever came with Mahumud is true (meaning the whole work of his mission). death is true; the interrogation by Moonkih and Nykee (the two angels) is true; the resurrection is true; destruction is true; the Bridge of Sirraat is true; the scales are true; looking into the book is true; heaven and earth are true; hell is true; the day of judgment is true. Of these things there is no doubt-all are true; and, further, that God, the great and

"The religious man generally prepares his own winding sheet, keeping it always ready, and occasionally taking out this monitor to add another verse or chapter, as the train of thought may have urged at the time. I have seen this done by the Meet Hadjee Shash, who appropriated a piece of fine white cambric muslin he had accelered from the total section of the works of the work of the section of the works. propriated a piece or time winter purpose. glorious God, will raise all the dead bodies from their graves.' Then the Maulvee reads the following prayer or benediction, which is called Dooar prayer: ' May the Lord God, abundant in mercy, keep you with the true speech; may he lead you to the perfect path; may he grant you knowledge of him and of his prophets. May the mercy of God be fixed upon you for ever. Ameen. This concluded, the Maulvee This concluded, the Maulvee quits the grave, and slowly moves forty measured paces in a line with it; then, turning round, he comes again to the grave, with the same solemnity in his steps, and, standing on the edge, he prays.... O great and glorious God! we beseech thee with humility make the earth comfortable to this thy servant's side, and raise his soul to thee, and with thee may he find merey and forgiveness.' 'Ameen, smeen,' is responded by all present. This ends the funeral service. The earth is closed over by the servants, &c.; and, except with the very poor, the grave is never entirely forsaken, day or night, during the forty days of mourning. Readers of the Khoraun are paid for this service; and in the families of the nobility the grave is attended for years by those hired, who are engaged to read from that book perpetually, relieving each other at intervals day and night. They believe that when the Manlvee quits the grave, the angels enter to interrogate the dead body, and receive the confession of his particular faith: this is the object of the Maulvee's retiring forty paces, to give the angels time to enter on their mission to the dead. The Mussulmauns all believe that Mhidhie, the standing proof, as he is called, will visit the earth at a future period: they are said to possess prophecies that lead them to expect the twelve hundred and sixtieth year of the Hegirah as the time for his coming. The Soonies say this Emaum has yet to be born; the Sheahs believe the Emaum Mhidhie is the person to reappear. Some believe he is still on earth, dwelling, as they conjecture, in the wilds and forests; and many go so far as to assert that Mhidhie visits (without being recognised) the Holy House of Mecca annually, on the great day of sacrifice; but I cannot find any grounds they have for this opinion. They also possess a prophecy, on which much dependence is placed, that When the four quarters of the globe contains Christian inhabitants, and when the Christians approach the confines of Kaabah, then may men look for that Emaum who is to come. And it is the general belief amongst Mussul-mauns, founded on the authority of their most revered and valued writers, that Emaum Mhid-hie will appear with Jesus Christ at his second coming, and with whom, they declare and firmly believe, he will act in concert, to purge the world of sin and wickedness. When, they add, 'all men shall be of one mind and one faith.'

"When I have conversed with some of them on the improbability of Mahumud's prophetic mission, I have been silenced by a few words. ' How many prophets were sent to the Israelites ?' ' Many.' 'You cannot enumerate them? then, is it too much to be probable, that God's mercy should have been graciously extended to the children of Ishmael? they also are Abra-ham's seed. The Israelites had many prophets, in all of whom we believe; the Ishmaelites have one prophet only, whose mission was to draw men from idolatry to the true God. All men,' they add, 'will be judged according to their fidelity in the faith they have professed. It is not the outward sign which makes a man the true Mussulmaun; neither is it the mere profession of Christianity which will clear the man at the last day. Religion and faith are of

"An idea has crept into the minds of some, that whoever offers up to God, at different periods of his life, such animals as are deemed clean and fitting for sacrifice, the same number and kind, on their day of passing Sirraat, shall be in readiness to assist them on the passage over. On this supposition is grounded the object of princes and nobles in India offering camels in sacrifice on the day of Buckrah Eade. This event answers to our Scripture account of Abraham's offering; but the Mussulmauns say, the son of Abraham so offered was Ishmael, and not Isaac. I have disputed the point with some of their learned men, and brought them to search through their authorities. In some one or two there is a doubt as to which was the son offered; but the general writers, and most of the Mussulmauns themselves, believe Ishmael was the offering made by Abraham. 'The scales are true;' the Mussulmauns believe, that on the day of judgment, the good and the bad deeds of every mortal will be submitted to the scales prepared in heaven for that purpose. 'Looking into the book is true;' the Mussulmauns believe that every human being from their birth is attended by two angels; one resting on the right shoulder, the other on the left, continually. Their business is to register every action of in his mercy to keep the person in the good and perfect way. When evil ways are to be registered, they mourn with interest to be registered, they mourn with interest to be recorded, they beseech the Almighty pestilential cholers may reach the metropolis of the North. So convinced are we of the stern good sense of its clever inhabitants. registered, they mourn with intercessions to God, that his mercy may be extended, by granting them repentant hearts, and then his forgiveness. Thus they explain Looking into the book is true,' that whatever is contained in this book will be looked into on the day of judgment, and by their deeds therein registered shall they be judged.

"They have a firm belief in the efficacy of prayer by proxy; and the view they have of departed spirits is still more singular. They believe the soul hovers over the body in the grave for some time, and that the body is so far animated as to be sensible of what is passing; as when the Maulvee is repeating the service the angels visit in the grave, or when the Khoraun is read. Hence the belief in the efficacy of prayer and reading as substitutes for neglected or omitted duties whilst on earth.

" I have but little to add as regards the manner of worship amongst my Mussulmaun acquaintance; but here I cannot omit remarking, that the women are devout in their prayers, and strict in their observance of ordinances. That they are not more generally educated is much to be regretted; this, however, is their misfortune, not their fault. The Mussulmaun faith does not exclude the females from a participation in the eternal world, as has so often been asserted by people who could not have known them; and the good Mussulmaun proves it by his instruction of the females under his control in the doctrines of Mahumud, and who he believes to be as much dependent on him for guidance on the road to heaven, as for personal protection from want or worldly dangers."

The Catechism of Health, &c. By A.B. Gran-ville, M.D., F.R.S. 3d edit. with additions. London, 1832. Colburn and Bentley.

In this new edition of the Catechism of Health, Dr. Granville reiterates his arguments against the contagiousness of cholera, and explains away the facts connected with its arrival and its progress in this country. The Dr. must have been egregiously misinformed with regard to facts, or deceived by misrepresentations. There are some authorities which he quotes, to whom we shall not allude for fear of bringing them into notice, but we are sorry that no others could be found whose statements would bear out the dogmas of Dr. G. The author says, in one part of his work, " I observe many ladies, some without, but many more with children, going about town in open carriages, even as late as six or seven o'clock in the evening, at this season of the year. Let me tell those persons that they will rue such a practice by and hy. It is pregnant with danger just now." This is the result of mistaken notions of disease. Would it not have been infinitely betdrive to Newcastle, than lead them to suppose shadow of a reason?

arrival, and not a murmur or a "falsehood" will be heard upon the subject; but the disease will be met manfully, and treated skilfully. From certain feelings that we know are already gaining ground in our city of London, which meet with but too earnest a reception on Change, and which are fostered by such works the modern Babylon.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

ERUPTION OF VESUVIUS, &C. Naples, December 30th, 1831.

AFTER the lava from Vesuvius, on the side towards Pompeii, had ceased to flow for nearly two months, and the volcano, with the occasional eruption of a thick smoke, had been tolerably quiet; we were suddenly alarmed on the evening of Christmas day, by seeing a considerable stream of lava flowing down the side of the mountain towards Naples, or more properly Portici, precisely on the way by which travellers usually ascend from the hermitage of Salvatore. Previously, in the morning, we had remarked circumstances which seemed to prognosticate this event. During the whole day the entire declivity of the mountain had been enveloped in a dense fog, which remained stationary, and proved to be the smoke from the streaming lava, that became visible at the approach of evening.

On the first evening the stream reached the valley of Atrio del Cavallo, which lies at the foot of the mountain. On the second day, the ter to tell our fair friends that there is no 26th, it made a turn towards the right, as seen danger unless they order the "coachman" to from this place, in the direction towards Resina; the hermitage lies on the right, and that a poison lurks in the air—making them will therefore escape. It appears that it flows fearful, distrustful, and unhappy, without the in the enormous bed of the lava of 1822, and will, it is hoped, expend itself in it before it reaches the vineyards. But should it last longer than the preceding one on the opposite aide, it may possibly occasion much damage, as the vineyards are here much nearer to the crater. This stream has not been accompanied by any, unless very partial, eruptions from the crater; though some persons affirm that they have heard detonations at this place. Thus w have every night a scene before us, to behold which alone would repay a visit to Naples.

It almost seemed as if we had approached 10° nearer to the equator: till Christmas we have as the one before us, there is too much reason had by night 8°, and by day from 12° to 14° to believe that the contrary will be the case in Reaumur of heat. With much surprise we saw the acacias in the villa, which had scarcely lost their leaves, put forth new ones. It is now rather more wintry - if a temperature of 6° or 7° of heat can be called winter.

The farce called the "Cholera Morbus." lately performed in the Fenice theatre, was prohibited after a few representations.

The excavations at Pompeii, which are usually undertaken in the presence of distinguished persons, are not often so productive as the one which was undertaken on such an occasion on the 26th of November last, when four rooms and a kitchen in the Casa dell' Ancosa were opened. Many vessels of bronze and utensils of iron were found there. But the most remarkable were a large number of amphoræ for wine, which were discovered in one of the chambers. The forms of many are quite new; and on most of them are Greek and Latin inscriptions written in black ink. In several jars a great deal of dried wine was found, which being dissolved in water had still a strong taste. In the kitchen, coals and ashes were lying on the hearth; and on a beautiful pedestal of Giallo antico, was a lamp of terra cotta, in the form of a youth kneeling and holding a patera in his hand. A female skeleton found in the same place is perhaps that of the slave who had the superintendence of the kitchen.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.

MR. BRANDE commenced the evening meetings for the session by a series of observations, gold and silver, and the commercial effect of a small quantity of one of these metals in the other. The ductility, malleability, and general characters, such as colour, &c. of gold, are not affected by the presence of a small quantity of silver: one part of alloy to eleven parts of pure gold, is necessary to render the latter workable. The refiners of former times used silver in this quantity as their alloy; more recently, however, copper has been substituted; the profit of extracting the former remunerating the refiner for his trouble. If five grains of gold be found in one pound weight of silver, the refiner's expense is covered. The old guines, in which silver is the alloy, is much whiter than the recent gold coinage, in which copper is used; hence the dealers in the precious metals, both at home and abroad, but especially in Paris, select the pale guineas and sovereigns, which are submitted to the separating powers of the refiner, from whose hands the gold does not escape in the shape of coin. To put an end to this practice, so detrimental to the commercial interests of any country where gold and silver form the standard of circulation, and to keep the gold coin in the country, copper is used as the alloy, which completely destroys the refiner's expectations of profit. Gold submitted to the action of nitric acid leaves a residuum of black powder, having the essential qualities of gold; the same metal containing an alloy of silver, submitted to the same test, leaves the acid colourless: with an alloy of copper, a green tint is imparted.

In the library were exhibited, - forms of experiments on capillary attraction; in which spheres of wire-gauze were retained full of water by capillary force, and in which the earlier experiment (tried first, we believe, by Mr. Pearsall, in the laboratory of the R. I.) of apparently closing the mouth of a jar by wire-gauze, was shewn; original drawings, by Capt. Irton, of the late volcano on the coast of Sicily, in which those clouds of vapour resembling snow or wool, noticed in a recent account of the late volcano on the coast of Sicily, in the Lit. Gaz., were made beautifully apparent. Mr. Faraday stated, that at the next evening meeting he should deliver some remarks on the reproductive powers of the planaria. The present session commences under very favourable auspices; and the crowded state of the library and theatre on the first night, testifies that the "Friday evening meetings have not lost that attraction for which they have been so long and so justly celebrated. As a relief to the lectures on the severer sciences. Dr. Clark delivers a course on the evidences of design in creation, in which he purposes to shew evidences of wisdom pursued in the structure of plants, and traced in the human body; evidences of contrivance observed in the study of the lower animals, in the anatomy of birds, and the structure of insects. Another pleasing course of lectures will be Mr. Smart's, illustrative of the ancient English drama, to the era of Shakspeare inclusive.

Phonix. The earliest account of the phonix Mexico nearly nine digits, and at Paramatta is given by Herodotus, the father of history; four digits, of the Sun's disc will be obscured. and this has been copied, with additions (a story seldom loses in its transmission), by S., the eclipse will be annular. 19d 2h 5m_the Pliny, Tacitus, Pomponius Mela, Horapollo, Sun enters Pisces. Mariana, and other writers. Among the rest, our old English writer, Bartholomew Glantville, as translated by Trevisor, and printed in black letter by Wynkyn de Worde in 1498, SAVS

"St. Ambrose, in Exameron, sayth: of the humoure or ashes of fenix ariseth a newe byrde and wexeth, and, in space of tyme, he is clothed with feathers and wyngis, and restored into the kind of a byrde, and is the most fairest byrde that is, - most like to the pecocke in fethers, and loveth wilderness, and gadreth his meate of cleane greenes and fruites. Alanus speketh of this byrde, and saith, that whan the hyghest byshop Onyas hadde buylded a temple in the citie of Helyopolys in Ægypt, to the lykenes of the temple of Jherusalem, and the fyrste daye of Easter, whanne he hadde gathered moche sweete smellynge woode, and sette it on fyre uppon the altar to offer sacrifyce, to all mennes syghte suche a byrde came sodaynely, and fell into the myddel of the fyre and was brente anone to ashes in the fyre of the sacrifyce; and the ashes abode there, and was besely kepte and saved by the commandemente of the preeste; and within three dayes, of these ashes was bred a lyttel worme, that took the shape of a byrde atte the laste, and flewe into the wyldernesse."

"This account," Mr. Rennie remarked, "of a worm being generated out of the ashes of a sacrifice, and afterwards becoming a bird, is precisely of a piece with the methods given by Virgil and Columella for the generation of bees from dead carcasses, which originated in an imperfect knowledge of the natural history of insects, as I have explained at length in Insect Transformations; while the appearance of a bird alighting on the altar must have obviously arisen from some eagle or vulture pouncing upon the carcass of the animal sacrificed, —a circumstance I should imagine of occasional occurrence when altars were situated in the open air, and which in Greece or Rome, instead of the bird's being considered a phonix, would have been hailed as an avatar (if I may borrow the Brahminical term) of Jupiter himself. That such were the circumstances, which in process of time were worked up into the fabulous and fanciful stories of the phænix, I have not a doubt; and it appears to me, that this is the only plausible and rational explanation which can be given; though a vast deal of learning, and no little ingenuity, has been expended in other views."

This account is strongly corroborated by an anecdote given by Bruce the traveller, of an eagle (gypaëtus barbatus, Storr,) in the very country where the phœnix was said to appear, darting down while his party were dining in the open air, and carrying off a part of their dinner. It is farther remarkable, that Bruce says of this genuine phænix, as we may call it, that "the feathers of the belly and breast were of a gold colour," which might almost pass for a translation of Pliny's description of the ancient phoenix. Mr. Rennie exhibited a specimen of this bird to a numerous audience,

THE COMET.

WE have seen a letter from Gibraltar, dated the 7th instant (if we are not mistaken, for we have trusted to memory), in which it is stated. that for several minutes on the preceding evening a considerable portion of the tail of the comet was visible to the inhabitants in these parts. The comet itself was not seen, but its direction was found to be northerly, so that we may soon expect this celestial visitor.

LITERARY AND LEARNED. BOYAL SOCIETY.

ME. LUBBOCK in the chair. The reading of Dr. Ritchie's * paper on Voltaic electricity was resumed, and the conclusion deferred till the next meeting. William Pole, Esq. F.R.S., presented a series of impressions from copper-plates. exhibiting a new style of engraving in parallel lines, by means of an instrument, the point of which is successively passed over a coin or other object, and the appearance of relief in the en-graving is strikingly produced. Professor Plana, of Turin, presented his memoir on Jupiter and Saturn; and Lieutenant Frend, R.N., a curious set of Burmese weights brought by himself from Ragoon.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.

MR. HAMILTON in the chair. Mr. Knight presented two extensive and very interesting lithographic views of the neighbourhoods of the Borough and the northern end of London Bridge in 1830, previous to their removal for the approaches to the New Bridge. Mr. S. Smirke communicated a paper descriptive of some remains of the ancient palace of Whitehall, consisting of an apartment of solid groined masonry in the basement story of a house in Whitehall Yard, called Cromwell House. This palace formerly belonged to the Archbishops of York, and was called York House, until Henry the Eighth gave it the name of Whitehall, on annexing it to the royal domains after the fall of Wolsey. The paper was accompanied by drawings, shewing the ground-plan, a section of the room, and an arched doorway of the Tudor style of architecture. Mr. Smirke observed, that the present floor of the room was raised about five feet above the original pavement, which is nearly level with the high-water mark of the Thames, and must have been very liable to inundation.

The Secretary read some letters communi-cated by Mr. Watham, from the records of Chatham Hospital at Manchester. One was dated 16th May, 1648, and noticed a disturbance which had taken place near the House of Commons. A little previous to the execution and a large body of countrymen came to London to petition the parliament on the subject; and, being kept waiting a long time without an answer, forced their way to the doors of the House, when they were told they should have their desire; upon which they left the House rather tumultuously, expressing their joy at the prospect (as they thought) of the king being saved. A slight pretext, however, served for calling in the military, who attacked the countrymen, and several were killed and others wounded.

BOYAL ASIATIC SOCIETY.

SIR GEORGE THOMAS STAUNTON in the chair. The following, among other donations, were presented: viz. from Colonel Tod, a fragment of a very ancient inscription on stone, from the temples of Baralli, in the Oopermal, or Highlands of Mewar: it appears to record the repairs of some temples by a pious monarch, who devoted to this purpose the spoils obtained by him in war: the date seems to be S. 981, or A.D. 1037: -- from Colonel Colebrooke, the model of the palanquin and attendants of an adikar of Ceylon, and models of twenty-one natives of Ceylon, of various castes and professions, carved in wood, and properly coloured;
—from the Rev. Dr. Mill, a work called Christa Sangitá, being the sacred history of our Saviour in Sanscrit verse. The reading of the late Dr. White's account of the fair at the Hot Wells, near Surat, was concluded. These hot wells are situated about fifty miles SE. of Surat, and are resorted to annually at the full moon of Chitra, which in 1810 was on the 19th of April; and at this period, as the Brahmins affirm, the temperature of the waters is miraculously lowered, to enable the pious devotee to avail himself of their holy and purifying influence in the form of a bath. origin of the religious veneration in which these springs are held by the Hindus is, that they are related to have been produced by the power of Rama, while in pursuit of Sita his wife, to serve instead of the sacred water of the Ganges for the ordinances of religion. The temperature of the springs varies from 111° (Fahr.) in one, to 120° in another. The paper concludes with a short account of the ceremonies at the Jatra, or fair. The reading of a paper by the Chevalier Jacob Gräburg d'Hem-sö, being an account of the great historical work of Ibn Khaldūn, the History of the Berbers, was commenced. Several gentlemen were elected members.

ON A PASSAGE IN CROKER'S BOSWELL. &c. Benhall Vicarage, Jan. 20, 1832.

SIR, - In Dr. Strahan's volume of Johnson's Prayers, at p. 205, the following passage occurs: " Before I went to the altar I prayed the occasional prayer; at the altar I commended my Φ, and again prayed the prayer."
 Mr. Croker, in his late edition of Boswell's

We are not sure that we have got the names cor-rectly, as they were not very distinctly read.

Johnson, conjectures that these letters were the initials of form piles-for which the Edinburgh Review, No. CVII. p. 9, has accused him of ignorance, and of course rejects the interpretation. Mr. Croker says, that Dr. Strahan seems not to have understood the words; but whether he did or not does not appear. I am inclined to think that he did. But that Mr. Croker's interpretation is erroneons I have no doubt; for had these letters stood generally for "dear friends departed," and not for particular persons, there would have been no necessity for concealment, as Johnson was in the habit of praying at least for some who were dead, as far as he might lawfully. Mr. Croker is again wrong in supposing the words necessarily to be Greek because the initial letters were so-they simply signify my THrale Friends-0 4.

To prove this assertion, turn to p. 221 of Dr. Strahan's book; you will find — "On Wednesday, April 11, 1781, was buried my dear friend Thrale, and with him were buried many of my hopes and pleasures. * * * Farewell! May God, that delighteth in mercy, have had mercy on thee. I had constantly prayed for him some time before his death.' Thus my first point is proved—that Johnson prayed for the Thrale family; and consequently that these letters might stand for them.

Next look at p. 227. " Easter Sunday, 1781. I commended my 0° friends, as I have formerly done." Here we have got a second step, and ascertained that the letter + meant friends.

Now, to prove that 8 stood for Thrale, turn to p. 230, Sept. 1781, where the following passage occurs: "When Thrale's health was broken, for many months before his death, which happened, April 4, I constantly montioned him in my prayers, and after his death have made particular supplication for his surviving family to this day." Thus we have obtained the signification of the other letter. A sense of delicacy in a custom, however pious, yet very unusual, made Johnson conceal the names of a family under Greek initials. On turning to my copy of Dr. Strahan's book, I find that, more than ten years since, I had written a note in the margin of the page, giving this interpretation of the text; and as it has been the subject of much discussion, I consider that you will not dislike this communication. Sir, your obedient servant,
JOHN MITFORD.

P.S. I must mention an absurd inconsistency in Dr. Johnson's criticisms, which appears from a passage of this book. In his Life of Milton he had ridiculed the notion, asserted on sufficient authority, that Milton's poetical powers varied according to different seasons of the year-" his vein ran strongest from the autumnal to vernal equinox." But at p. 148 of Dr. Strahan's work, Johnson says.... Between Easter and Whitsuntide, having always considered this time as propitious to study, I began to learn the low Dutch language," &c.

In his criticism on Gray's Ode to Eton College... Say, Father Thames," &c...he ob. serves, that it was absurd to appeal to the Thames, who had no means of knowing better than himself. Now, turn to Rasselas (chap. 20) -" The princess cast her eyes upon the river that flowed before her :- 'Answer,' said she, great Father of Waters, &c. ; tell me if thou waterest through all thy course a single habitation from which thou dost not hear the murmura of complaint," &c.

[•] In the last No. of the Literary Gazette, Mr. Ritchie's appointment to the Natural Philosophy chair in the London University was communicated. IMPORTANT DISCOVERIES WEAR POWPEIL. FOR several weeks past Professor Zahn has caused excavations to be made in various spots at Bosco-tre-Case, (between Vesuvius and Pompeii,) which scarcely leave a doubt that a city is buried there, which is supposed to have been called Toso, and which, with Herculaneum, Pompeii, and Stabia, forms the fourth of the cities whose fate it shared at the same time. One of these excavations is extremely interest. ing. You descend 30 palms perpendicular into a deep hollow, into a peristyle surrounded with pillars. Thence four subterranean gal-leries have been excavated in the direction of Naples, Sarno, Vesuvius, and Pompeii. In the first some chambers have been discovered. containing paintings and many bas - reliefs. These chambers, which have been only partially excavated, give the promise of a rich harvest. In the gallery leading to Pompeii, an ancient road has been traced in the direction from Naples to Sarno. In the two other galleries there are various fragments of beautiful paintings, terra-cotta, iron, and bronze. Some human skeletons, and one of a hog, have also been found there: likewise much carbenised wood.

SERTCHES OF SOCIETY.

THE SCOTTISH LITEBARY DINNER.

THE entertainment to commemorate the birth day of Burne, and the presence of the Ettrick Shepherd, as noticed in our last, took place at the Freemasons' Hall on Wednesday; and although a numerous assemblage was anticipated. the numbers actually exceeded all expectation. and filled the Hall. This influx of persons without previous notice, led to some little confusion in the arrangement of tables and seats and a brief delay in the dinner hour ; but ever want was supplied with a rapidity which did great credit to the tavera, and about 7 o'clock the visiters sat down to an excellent repeat, as well served as could be hoped for in se crowded a company. It seemed, indeed, that in the first instance only Space was needed to give entire satisfaction; and at the last, only Time to extend the festivities beyond the midnight at which the chair was vacated. The general appearance of the half was indeed very animating, and especially when connected with the occasion, and the national spirit which it had elicited. On the right of the chairman, Sir John Malcolm, were ranged the Ettrick Shepherd, Lord Mahon, Sir George Murray, Sir John Warrender, Mr. F. Mills, Mr. Mackinnen, the Hon. Mr. Herbert, Mr. H. Ellis, two Mesers. Drummonds, Mr. Forbes as representative of his father the worthy barenet, Mr. A. Spottiswoode, Mr. J. Murray, Sir Peter Laurie; on his left the two sone of Burns, Lord Porchester, Sir Pulteney Malcolm, Colonel El-phinstone, Mr. R. A. Dundas, Mr. P. S. Stew-art, Mr. Sedgewick, Mr. Aikin the Consul at Archangel, and the hoy to whom Burns addressed his "Advice to a young Friend," Mr. Sotheby, Sergeant Spankie; while in various other parts were seen Messrs. Lockhart, Mus-chicon, Patrick Robertson, Galt, Cunninghero. R. Montgemery, Crefton Croker, Magina, S. C. Hall, Don T. de Trueba, W. Fraser, Lemon, Logan, Picken, Martin (painter), John Burnet, and many others distinguished in the annals of science, the fine arts, and polite literature. On the removal of the cloth the usual leval and patriotic toests and songs were given; after which the president drank, "The me-mory of Burna," prefaced by a speech of con-siderable length, in which he drew an able picture of the poet's career, and quoted many of his verses with great felicity and effect. Both the sons of the poet standing up, the eldest expressed their gratitude for the tribute to their father's genius. The next toast, also prefaced by an apt and interesting address, called up the Ettrick Shepherd, whom the plandits of the assembly compelled to mount a chair, whence he return ed thanks in the Doric of his pative hills, with most characteristic simplicity and naiveté. He hailed the triumph of that moment as the proud reward of all he had aspired to do and to become; the happy recompense of those toils through which a poor shepherd had hoped to acquire his country's approbation, and the fame of being acknowledged one of her native minstrels. The whole did much credit to his good sense and feeling, and he was loudly cheered by the company. "Sir Walter Scott, and his happy return," followed, and the chairman again des Sir Walter Scott, and his happy canted on the talents of that high ornament of Scottish literature. Mr. Lockhart returned thanks, and related several precious anecdotes of his illustrious kinsman, as well as traits in the life of the Ettrick Shepherd. Of these we may notice, that Burns only met Scott once when the latter was but seventeen years old, yet, from something that then passed, he predicted that he would figure in his country's annals: and that Scott, while still young and enthusiastically in search of early legends and ballad lore, found Hogg, a poer peasant, in a wild and sequestered valley, possessed of a larger store of what he was seeking than was in the memory of all the province beside.* From that period their friendship had been uninterrupted... Lord Porchester now gave the health of the chairman, with a suitable encomium, noticing his distinguished literary works, his oriental scholarship, and the abilities he had displayed in various quarters of the world. Sin J. Malcolm returned his acknowledgments, and proposed Lord Porchester, Mr. Sotheby, and the poets of England, who had honoured this festival with their presence. His lordship spoke eloquently in reply, and pronounced a beautiful eulogium upon the ameliorating effects produced upon individuals and communities by the cultivation of the muses. "Lord Mahon, and the historians of England," received a similar compliment, and his lerdship spoke briefly but admirably in return: his lordship concluded by giving "Sir Pulteney Malcolm, and the naval heroes of Scotland;" and alluded with much good taste to Sir Pulteney's admirable conduct in the difficult command at St. Helena. and to the tribute of respect which he had extorted from the discernment of Buonsparte: for which, and the plaudits attending it, Sir Pulteney expressed his gratitude. The sailor, like the poet and the soldier, looked only to the approbation of his country, and he rejoiced in the testimony of that approbation now so flatteringly bestowed upon him. - The toast of Another anecdote of Hogg was, that being at dinner at a ducal table, the duchess said to him: "Were you ever here before, Mr. Hogg?" To which the Shephend, with his usual candour, replied, "Na, madam: I has been at the yett (gate) wi' beasts that I was driving into England a but Lucyue was inside o'the hesses afters if.

"Sir George Murray, and the military heroes of Scotland," called up that gallant officer, who addressed his applauding countrymen in a manner which seemed to be peculiarly grateful to their feelings. While he disclaimed it for his own humble services, he nobly awarded the laurel to his glorious companions in arms,—a Hopetoun, an Abercrombie, a Moere, and a Graham. He then mentioned his early recollection of Burns, whom he considered his father's house to have been honoured by receiving within its walls; and playfully alluded to what the cheirman had stated of his sister's being the "Phemy" of the poet,

" a bennier lass

and expressed his hope, as every bard was in duty bound to maintain the peerless beauty of the fair whom he selected for his theme, that the Ettrick Shepherd (whose acquaintance he this night rejoiced to have made), would not be provoked to jealousy in consequence of this comparison above the beauties of Yarrow. Sir George was warmly cheered throughout.-The ensuing teasts were, Lord Brougham, as a Scotsman born and the son of a Scots mother (a descendant of Robertson the historian), Sergeaut Spankie, Mr. J. Stuart, Mr. P. Robertson, and both bars — Mr. Robertson returned appropriate thanks. We had hoped for a touch of his unrivalled humour; but the night was wearing late, and the rest of the proceedings were obliged to be hurried through in rather a tumultuous manner .- "Sir Peter Laurie, and the city of London," were drank ; with a deserved compliment to the worthy alderman for the zeal with which he had always shewed himself the friend of every Scottish charity. Sir Peter expressed himself very neatly; and observed of the Scottish character, that if it persevered and laboured to acquire competent wealth, it was not to hoard like the miser, but, to use the words of the bard, " for the glorious privilege of being independent." -Mr. Robertson drank, " Captain Beeil Hall, net only as a distinguished naval officer, but as a popular author." Captain Hall, in returning thanks, happened to mention the word "politics," which was misunderstood by some of the meeting, and considerable interruption ensued; at last be was allowed to proceed, and it was explained that his only reference to politics was to congratulate the company on an occasion where all parties discarded them, to join in a national tribute to genius. captain, however, appeared to have been put out by the interruption; for he was again unfortunate in attempting to pay a pleasant compliment, upon the excellence of his dinners, to Sir George Warrender, whose health was next drank, in conjunction with the Scottish members of the legislature....Sir G. Warrender said he had no claim to have his name introduced on this occasion, and, however kindly intended, it had been done in a manner slike unexpected and painful to him. He came there as a Scotchman, proud to assist at a festival in honour of one of these eminent men who, in giving an imperishable fame to the poetry of Scotland, obtained for their country triumphs far more noble, far more durable, than even those which his gallant friend, who had lately addressed them, or than any other statesman or warrior, could achieve; for when the contests of individuals, and even of nations, for power had passed away, and were heard of no more, the verses of Burns and Walter Scott would still live in every quarter of the globe, to perpetuate their own glory, and to inspire ardent patriotism and intense love of

We mention this, because we observe that some of the newspapers (falsifying, by the by, the whole proceedings of the evening in a mest extraordinary fashion), consure the stewards for want of providence, &c. Now the stewards, on the praceding night, could only secretain the disposal of less than 200 tickets, and they provided, at their own risk, for 300 guests: another hundred coming without notice of their intention, were speedily accommodated; and surely the exertion to accomplish this is more to be praised, than any little partial failure or inconveniency (such as attends all large public dinners) is to be cavilled at, and blamed. The dinner and wines were of the first order; and at least nine-isothes of those present were highly gratified by their entertainment.

native land into every Scottish heart. - Mr. | served success at this theatre. The story rests P. S. Stewart, as another of the Scottish members, addressed the company with much energy, and restored harmony by remarking, that if he was not tried by his dinners, he hoped to be always tried by his deserts. In conclusion, he drank the health of Mr. Galt, whose literary talents shed a lustre on the west of Scotland. with which he was particularly connected. It was now, however, near the witching hour of night, or we might say of night's black arch, the key-stane; and many from the lower parts of the hall had crowded up to the top; so that regularity of speech, or bumper, or song, there could be none. Galt's thanks died in embryo; and the concluding toasts of Mr. Murchison and Mr. Sedgewick, and the sciences of Scotland and England; the London Burns Club. the stewards, and even the ladies, had but their cheers, and passed away. At length the pipes droned forth, and the festive drama

We ought to record that it was enlivened by many bowls of punch brewed by Hogg in Burns' bowl, and in general very kindly and socially helped into the many glasses sent up for it by Lord Mahon: there was also some beautiful singing by Broadhurst, Wilson, Templeton, and Messrs. Jolly, Stansbury, Chapman, and other vocalists. The Shepherd, too, treated us with an original song, the burden of which was "Robin's awa." Îtisa lament for Burns as the best of the minstrels; but it was brought in by a laugh, in consequence of the toast-master's calling for silence for a song from Mr. Shepherd.

THE GARRICK CLUB.

By circulars addressed to the members of the Club, we observe that the dinner, intended for the 1st of February, is postponed, and that the Club opens on that day without any festive ceremony. It was apprehended that the circumstances of a new house, with a new kitchen, new servants, &c. &c. &c., might cause the entertainment to be less pleasant than the committee wished it to be.

DRAMA.

DRURY LANE.

On Wednesday, the Rent Day, a domestic drama, by Mr. Jerrold, and founded, among other things, on some of Wilkie's admirable pictures, was produced with great and most deof A very absurd attempt has been made in some of the newspapers to attach a political effect to this meeting inching can be farther from truth. The judicious chairman never uttered a syllable which could bear the slightest allusion to politica. The healths of the King and of the Queen were each received with loyal applause; and the toasts of Wellington, the hero of his country, and of Brougham, a minister so distinguished in many respects, were equally drank with plaudits due to their separate individual characters. We repeat, that there was not an iota of politics introduced: on the contrary, Mr. Henry Ellis, not only eminent for his literary productions, but a very near relative of another minister, Lord Goderich, sat opposite the chairman as his friend and visitor. It seems most ridiculous, under these circumstances, to try to torture this into a party assembly, as if the public were as crazy about these matters as the newspapers; and the directors of the feast should have had a measure for noise, in order to regulate the shoults of festivity, lest one toast should have a louder and longer cheer than another! To us it appeared distinctly, that the old advice of Tullochgorum was strictly observed, and that "Whig and Tory did agree"

"Whig and Tory did agree
To spend the night in mirth and glee."

It would surely be easy to form an annual national meeting for this day, on an extended scale, with a surplus fund for the encouragement of Scottish literature and arts: this was a favourite project with the late Sir Alexander Boswell. Were such in existence, the beautiful monument to Burns on the Calton Hill, to receive Flaxmanter that the calton Hill, the cal man's statue of the poet, would not languish, as it now does, for a paltry two hundred pounds to finish it. We will cheerfully co-operate with any friends to carry this purpose into effect.—Ed. L. G.

on the sufferings of a worthy family, pressed by a harpy steward for an arrear of rent; on the wretched condition of the steward himself. the victim of two villains, who are aware of his being a condemned criminal who had escaped from justice; and on the interference of the squire, who has been a secret observer of their transactions. At present we have only room to say, that the first act was most natural and excellent; the second, aiming at too much dramatic effect, though very striking, not quite so good; but the whole worthy of higher praise than could with justice be accorded to many pieces within our recollection. The acting, too, was as fine as the Rent Day itself.

ADELPHI.

On Monday, and throughout the week, has been performed here, with great eclat, the first version with which London has been favoured of the famous Robert le Diable. The said Robert having made a d-lish noise in Paris, became, of course, an object with all our dramatic writers, theatrical managers, musical publishers, et hoc genus omne ; nay, he even inspired better men with a diabolical furor, and, it is said, led a bishop out of the right course to go off at score. What is to be the final result we cannot tell; we can only say that the Adelphi has managed to produce a spectacle so grand and imposing as to be incredible, unless seen, in so small a house. But the stage in this theatre does possess some peculiar advantages very favourable to such representations; for, though very limited on the wings, it is deep in itself, and from great capacity below, has a power and alacrity of sinking in toto, which the largest theatres might covet in vain. Of these properties an excellent use has been made in several of the sea-pieces, melo-dramas, and pantomimes, produced with so much effect at the Adelphi; but on no preceding occasion have they been employed with such skill and power as in this Robert the Devil. Of the performances we have to state, that Yates plays the Devil in a very superior style, and looks the character to admiration. Hemmings, who has gone on improving as a genteel and natural comedian, from season to season, as the son, does credit to his humanity; and Reeves in a comic part, engrafted on the original, takes a prominent and laughter-moving share in the humorous scenes. Mrs. Yates, always interesting, comports herself sweetly in the heroine; and Mrs. Fitzwilliams in the necessary soubrette, is all that could be wished. But the grand attraction is in the scenery and stage effects, which are splendid and striking in the extreme. We observed last week that this place of amusement was crowded to the utmost nightly: with Robert the Devil to boot, it is now more crowded.

The New Strand Theatre opened on Thursday, with, as we hear, performances tolerably adapted to the occasion.

UNREHEARSED STAGE EFFECTS.

Adelphi, Jan. 33 .- Yates, who is often compelled on first nights to merge the actor a little in the manager, produced, in his personation of the fiend in the Devil's Son, some curious effects. In the midst of the spectre-scene in the ruined monastery, it was perhaps not wholly out of character for a demon, determined that no means of heightening the terror of the scene should be omitted, to call out to his invisible agents, hidden among the tombs, " D-n it! the red fire!"-a reason, however, which will not apply equally to his concern lest the signal a new piece.

that ruins his schemes and devotes him to perdition should be forgotten. The marriage of the hero and heroine, announced by the churchbell, proves "the defeat of the demon;" and Mr. Yates, while writhing and attitudinising as the fiend, called out as the manager, "The bell! the bell, I say!"—The sensation produced by the first night of Robert le Diable at the Academie Royale, on which occasion I was present, was enhanced by divers unrehearsed stage effects which occurred during the performance. A cloud which was rising up, that a change of scene might be effected behind it, suddenly gave way, and falling to the stage had well nigh smothered Taglioni. The actdrop was immediately lowered; and the contest for the possession of Robert by Pauline and the fiend at the conclusion, ended in a manner totally different from what M. Scribe had intended; for Nourrit (Robert), instead of being rescued, tumbled down aux enfers with Levasseur (Bertram). The Adelphi's first night, of course, was not behindhand with mishaps of an equally exciting nature. In the very terrible scene of the second act, wherein the prostrate statues of nuns become erect and subsequently animate, the machinery failing in one or two places at the left of the stage, divers of the figures tumbled from their pedestals with a softness of noise and flexibility of limb and drapery nothing short of astonishing in stone statues. Unfortunately, the most extraordinary accident happened to the most conspicuous statue on the whole stage; for the support of its feet giving way just as it was attaining its perpendicular, it uttered a sound wondrously like the shriek of a living female, and, to crown the mishap, was in an instant precipitated cleanly down a trap-door that had just opened directly under its feet for another statue to rise through-so that it must have alighted exactly on the head or shoulders of the astonished image beneath. Yates, who was on the stage, in vain rushed to save the too quickly evanishing form. † The following elegant morceau of gag, by Reeve, occurred in the second act:-Pauline (Mrs. Fitswilliam)-extending her hand to

Raimhaud Raimbaud, dear Raimbaud! am I not your own Pau-

Raimbaud (Reeve)—surveying her hand— Pauline, indeed! Paw-lean? Paw-fat, I think.

Coburg, Jan. 23 .- The announcement of Robert le Diable attracted me to this theatre; but I found only a spoilt version of the Covent Garden Duke of Normandy.‡ All went on smoothly till the close, when a curious contrast was formed to Nourrit's accident, through the agency, or rather non-agency, of a trap-door, which must have had the bump of adhesiveness very strongly developed on or for the occasion; for though the victim fairly flung himself upon it, the powers below could not succeed in dragging him more than an inch and a half down to perdition. It is very hard that the intentions of dramatists should be thus set at defiance that where they mean to send their heroes to the d____, they should remain upon earth, and that where they mean them to remain on earth they should go to him!

Drury Lane, Jan. 25 .- Is it not astonishing that the stage-folks never will learn what are and what are not the precincts of the stage

[•] On Nourrit's appearing after this accident, to announce the piece for repetition, he was saluted by vociferated inquiries, more especially from the ladies, of "Etercus bleast" Etercus bleast "Etercus bleast" it have since heard, from the first authority, that the young lady to whom this accident occurred was Miss Alleyn, Sola's pupil; and that she was hurt, but not seriously.

‡ Though the Times of Thursday actually notices it as a new piece.

before and behind the curtain? Not even the tableau vivant of Wilkie's "Distraining for Rent," in the Rent Day, was suffered to remain unmarred - here, too, where the point was so essential—by the rushing on of footmen from both sides of the stage! I am sure they are not in Wilkie's picture-and we are content to have that presented as he drew it, without any addition whatever - certainly not such a one. In My own Lover, Wood has a duet with Miss Pearson. Miss Pearson sang her verse, and ended it with a very uncomfortably-sounding roulade: Wood followed, but just as he had reached the point for his cadence, he was seized with so violent a fit of coughing, that he stopped short, made a wry face expressive of his utter inadequacy to the desired achievement, and retired barking, ad lib., to the back of the stage. The fiddles in the orchestra were in the most distressing state of indetermina-tion, which, however, the heroic Pearson soon relieved, by uttering a long indefinite cadenza in the gentleman's default and to his cough obligato, and immediately fell-to again upon her own part with her accustomed intrepidity. The effect was sublime.

VARIETIES.

Sir Walter Scott. - Letters have been received from a friend of Sir Walter Scott, dated Naples, Dec. 21, stating that the worthy baronet had not then been permitted to land, but was performing quarantine in the Barham frigate. It is gratifying to know that the voyage had proved beneficial to Sir Walter's general health, though we cannot say much of the removal of that affection which, by causing a pressure upon the brain, first created anxiety for our illustrious countryman.

The Pantheon. - This theatre, in Oxford Street, so long unoccupied, in consequence of some doubts as to its security, and also, we believe, of differences among proprietors or the utility and important results of this enter-claimants, has been sold for 16,000%. One prise. Perhaps, in a few years the wears trarumour gives it to Laporte, as a theatrical speculation; another to religion, as a Roman hospitable roof of the industrious farmer. Catholic chapel.

Fire-Escape. -_One on a very simple construction was lately suggested by Mr. Charles M. Willich to the Society of Arts. The idea is not new, as blankets have been often used with success; but we think if the plan pointed out by Mr. Willich were adopted, and a system established, many lives might be saved. It consists of a horse-hair net, about 14 feet long by 8 feet wide. He recommended that every police station should be furnished with one, which on an alarm of fire should be immediately brought to the spot. The manner of using the net is self-evident. There are always a sufficient number of persons present who would hold it extended. Horse-hair is recommended on account of its durability and elasticity. A fire-escape must be always perfect, and at hand speedily, or it is useless.

Crime in France. — Out of every 100 persons accused, 61 are regularly condemned. Out of the whole population, 1 in every 4,460 inhabitants is accused. In every 100 crimes, 25 are against the person, 75 against property. Experience shews that the number of murders is annually nearly the same; and what is still more singular, that the instruments, or means employed, are also in the same proportion. The inclination to crime is at its maximum in man about the age of 25; in woman, 5 years later. The proportion of men and women accused is 4 to 1. The seasons have an influence on crime. In summer more crimes are committed against the person, fewer against property; the reverse is the case in winter. The development of the inclination to crime agrees very perfectly with that of the passions and physical strength; and, on the other hand, the development of reason tends to restrain the inclination. The greatest physical strength of man is developed between the age of 30 and 35; and the greatest mental powers between the age of 45 and 50. At this age the greatest number of chefs. d'œuvre of the French theatre have been produced. It is a singular contrast, that about this age we find mental alienation most frequent and most difficult to remove. - Renus Encyclopédique et Annales d'Hygiène.

Introduction of Agriculture into Kamtechatka. We learn, by a letter dated from the harbour of Saint Peter and Saint Paul in Kamtschatka, June 30, that at the conclusion of the preceding year the different ranks of the inhabitants, the clergy, merchants, and officers, had voluntarily subscribed a considerable sum, to raise a fund for the introduction of agriculture into Kamtschatka. The plan was submitted to the government, and last spring the first agricultural labours were commenced. On the 31st of April the governor of Kamtschatka, accompanied by the inhabitants of Petropawloski, repaired to the fields prepared for cultivation, situated about forty wersts from the harbour, on the banks of the river Awatscha, near Staroi'-Ostrog. On the following morning, the 1st of May, a Te Deum was sung in the fields, in the bosom of which the first seeds of corn were deposited, and tears of grateful emotion bedewed the soil which was consecrated to future harvests. It was a truly imposing spectacle; - the solemn chant of the Te Deum in the midst of a desert enclosed by lofty mountains, in the presence of a small number of settlers, who had assembled from different parts of the vast Russian empire. After divine service, the priest delivered a short address on prise. Perhaps, in a few years the weary tra-veller may find repose on this spot, under the

A Petition of William Shackspere, of Rowington, Warwick, is in existence, dated March 3, 1651-2, and addressed to the commissioners of compounding, praying to be dismissed from farther attendance, his estate having been freed. Quare, who was this William Shackspere?

Newspaper Facts .- A Scots paper has this week informed its readers that a white mouse is a rara avis: and the Times, in its private correspondence from Cadiz, describing some bull-fights, says, "The following are the bulls selected for the fight: - two with red riband ornaments; two with yellow; two with celestial blue; and two with black ribands." These are Irish bulls.

Bon-Mot of Fashion .- A gentleman seeing the sister ladies M riding up St. James's Street, said, "Well, I never knew that among the force of England we could reckon on any troops in green" (the long green veils were certainly very uniform). "Look at them," replied his friend, "and see if they might not belong to the Rifle brigade."

LITERARY NOVELTIES.

[Literary Gazette Weekly Advertisement, No. IV. Jan. 28, 1839.]

Legends and Traditions of the Castles of England. A work with this title is, we are informed, in course of preparation, by Mr. Roscoe and Mr. Leitch Ritchle, authors of the Landscape and Heath's Picturesque Annuals; and is to be published by subscription, in Twelve Monthly Parts, with Engravings. It is proposed to comprise, not only a genuine narrative of the fortunes of the English Castles, but, in a more particular manner, the events of what may be termed their private history, founded upon legends and traditions.

Mr. Tait, of Edinburgh, has announced a new Magazine, to be supported by great abilities on the Whig or Reform side of politics. It is directly started in opposition to Blackwood: of course, we can give no opinion between a combatant about to enter the lists, and the old Tory warrior. All we can say is, that we wish success to literary merit, on whichever side it may be exerted. Legends and Traditions of the Castles of England. A

The District of LATIN GRAMMAR, for the Use of Schools.

By the Rev. PETER HALL, M.A.

The object of this Grammar is to furnish the young beginners with the Elements of the Latin Language in a more simple, brief, and comprehensive form, than has been accomplished in any other work with which the author is acquainted. The Prosody, being given in English, is placed before the Syntax, which is still retained in Latin; which the whole has been prepared with a minuteness of attention commensurate with the nicety and importance of the subject. portance of the subject.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

The Cabinet Cyclopædiu, No. XXVII. Italian Republics. By J. C. L. Sismondi. London, 1832. Longman and Co.; J. Taylor. THERE are some words which are like the sun—they dazzle us too much to look steadily on them: of this kind are those bright words, glory and liberty. Glory is in reality one of those terrible necessities imposed upon a nation in its infancy. The early history of all nations is the same—they have to conquer to exist; and all honour is given to the sword, which is their safeguard. The second period always arrives before they are prepared for it; and when their strength enables them to secure peace, that strength is turned to aggression, a false halo is flung over spear and shield, and often their strength is again exhausted before they learn that glory (we use the word exclusively in its military sense) belongs to one period only in society—that war is only not an evil when it is inevitable. Liberty is another word whose destiny is misapplication-it is too often used for the mere subversion of a particular government. A state may be a repub-lic, and yet enslaved. The Italian republics were little better than oppressive aristocracies; and we must own that in M. Sismondi's enthusiasm for the former days of Italy we do not participate. He concludes by saying-

" Italy is crushed; but her heart still beats with the love of liberty, virtue, and glory—she is chained and covered with blood; but she still knows her strength and her future destinyshe is insulted by those for whom she has opened the way to every improvement; but she feels that she is formed to take the lead again; and Europe will know no repose till the nation which, in the dark ages, lighted the torch of civilisation with that of liberty, shall be enabled herself to enjoy the light which she created."

Madame de Stael never made a more profound observation than in the assertion that " nations deserve their fate;"-they deserve it, because they make it. Is there an instance, in all history, where the interference of one country ever gave freedom or prosperity to another? In turning over these records of the early Italian republics, what do we find? Continual dissensions, small states struggling into brief existence, petty wars, and foreign inva-sions. The contention of the Guelphs and Ghibellines was a fertile source of crime and suffering; and, perhaps, of all governments that ever maintained an independence, Venice was the most monstrous instance of organised oppression that ever shewed what tyranny might be exercised, while based on terror and shrouded in mystery. The picturesque of liberty has done its cause more injury than all the efforts of despotism. When once people begin to say fine things, there is an end to their doing them. The word freedom has been in the mouths of the Italians for centuries; but its poetry has never been carried into ac-being nothing without a fact. For exertion, for independence, for reducing theory into practice, give us the Dutch; their history is a noble instance of a people bravely battling for, and stanchly maintaining, their rights. Spain was at least as powerful a foreign enemy as any with whose invasion Italy has had to contend; yet the yoke to which she yielded was broken in pieces by a country which had not one-hundreth part of her natural resources. A Dutch patriot, to be sure, is not so poetical as a Roman one; and far more spirit-stirring speeches may be made about the ancient glories of Rome than of Amsterdam; and yet, in reality, the history of the one people is of far more actual utility than that of the other. In the independence of Holland we may learn a most useful lesson of what human good may be effected by human exertion-a country won from the sea by perpetual struggles—rights forced from a powerful foe, and equitably divided—a just jealousy of power, together with a due conviction of the necessity of authority—the value of labour shewn even more in its consequences than in its reward; for it has formed the character of a commercial, religious, industrious, and contented people. The past contains few pages better worth studying than that which comprises the history of Holland.

The consideration of his subject has somewhat led us away from the author: we must now do justice to the clear, yet concise, manner in which he has treated his theme. An immense mass of historical research is compressed into a brief but distinct outline of Italian history. To those already acquainted with the wide field here traversed, this volume will be valuable as an excellent abstract; while to the less-informed reader, it will be delightful, as opening a wide harvest of interest and information. We quote the following singular picture of fanaticism in 1497-Savonarola was one of the early preachers against the abuses in the Romish church :-

"In the mean time, the rivalry encouraged by the court of Rome between the religious orders soon procured the pope champions eager to combat Savonarola: he was a Dominicanthe general of the Augustines - that order whence Martin Luther was soon to issue. Friar Mariano di Ghinazzano signalised himself by his zeal in opposing Savonarola: he presented to the pope, friar Francis of Apulia, of the order of minor observantines, who was sent to Florence to preach against the Florentine monk, in the church of Santa Croce. This preacher declared to his audience, that he knew Savonarola pretended to support his doctrine by a miracle. 'For me,' said he, 'I am a sinner; I have not the presumption to perform miracles; nevertheless, let a fire be lighted, and I am ready to enter it with him. I am certain of perishing, but Christian charity teaches me not to withhold my life, if in sacrificing it I tion. Now, to take an example an assertion but his friend and disciple, friar Dominic Buon- ing demands of the pope. The three imprivicino, eagerly accepted it. Francis of Apulia declared that he would risk his life against Savonarola only. Meanwhile, a crowd of monks, of the Dominican and Franciscan orders, rivalled each other in their offers to prove by the ordeal of fire, on one side the truth, on the other the falsehood, of the new doctrine. Enthusiasm spread beyond the two convents; many priests and seculars, and even women and children, more especially on the side of Savonarola, earnestly requested to be admitted to the proof. The pope warmly testified his gratitude to the Franciscans for their devotion. The signoria of Florence consented that two monks only should devote themselves for their respective orders, and directed the pile to be prepared. The whole population of the town and country, to which a signal miracle was promised, received the announcement with transports of joy. On the 17th of April, 1498, a scaffold, dreadful to look on, was erected in the public square of Florence. Two piles of large pieces of wood, mixed with faggots and broom which should quickly take fire, extended each eighty feet long, four feet thick, and five feet high; they were separated by a narrow space of two feet, to serve as a passage by which the two priests were to enter and pass the whole length of the piles during the fire. Every window was full; every roof was covered with spectators-almost the whole population of the republic was collected round the place. The portico called the Loggia de' Lanzi, divided in two by a partition, was assigned to the two orders of monks. The Dominicans arrived at their station chanting canticles, and bearing the holy sacrament. The Franciscans immediately declared that they would not permit the host to be carried amidst flames. They insisted that the friar Buonvicino should enter the fire, as their own champion was prepared to do, without this divine safeguard. The Dominicans answered, that 'they would not separate themselves from their God at the moment when they implored his aid.' The dispute upon this point grew warm—several hours passed away—the multitude, which had waited long, and begun to feel hunger and thirst, lost patiencea deluge of rain suddenly fell upon the city, and descended in torrents from the roofs of the houses-all present were drenched. The piles were so wet that they could no longer be lighted; and the crowd, disappointed of a miracle so impatiently looked for, separated with the notion of having been unworthily trifled with. Savonarola lost all his credit; he was henceforth rather looked on as an impostor. Next day his convent was besieged by the Arabbiati, eager to profit by the inconstancy of the multitude: he was arrested with his two friends, Domenico Buonvicino and Silvestro Marruffi, and led to prison. The Piagnoni, his partisans, were exposed to every outrage from the populace—two of them were killed; their rivals and old enemight precipitate into hell a heresiarch, who mies exciting the general ferment for their has already drawn into it so many souls.' This destruction. Even in the signoria, the majostrange proposition was rejected by Savonarola; rity was against them, and yielded to the presssoned monks were subjected to a criminal prosecution. Alexander VI. despatched judges from Rome, with orders to condemn the accused to death. Conformably with the laws of the church, the trial opened with the torture. Savonarola was too weak and nervous to support it: he avowed in his agony all that was imputed to him; and, with his two disciples, was condemned to death. The three monks were burnt alive, on the 23d of May, 1498, in the same square where, six weeks before, a pile had been raised to prepare them a triumph."

All thanks be to Italy for her poets, her painters, her philosophers-immortal the country of Dante, Raphael, and Galileo; but we do repeat, that her political history can only serve as a warning-not as an example.

Cartonensia; or, an Historical and Critical Account of the Tapestries in the Palace of the Vatican. By the Rev. W. Gunn, B.D. London, 1831. Ridgway.

WE have greatly to regret the having allowed this very interesting volume to remain so long unnoticed on our table: its own intrinsic merits really called for a different treatment; and it in a more than usual degree demanded an early notice, if, as we are credibly informed, the author had actually passed his eightieth year at the period when he submitted it to the public. Happily, in no portion of the work do we perceive any symptoms of decaying faculties; and not only is it free from the feebleness of age. but it is remarkably exempt from the garrulity for which that period of life is proverbial. On the contrary, it breathes a spirit as full of vigour of thought and expression, as acutely alive to the charms of its subject, as quick to the perception of moral excellence, and as earnest in the inculcating of its precepts, as if it had been the production of that happy period of life, that " mezzo del cammin di vita nostra," when both the body and the mind are naturally supposed to be in their highest state of perfection.

The name of Mr. Gunn is by no means new to the literary world. Independently of some treatises of minor importance, he distinguished himself, about thirteen years since, as the author of an Inquiry into the Origin and Influence of Gothic Architecture-a subject of considerable interest, and so treated that the work was received with general approbation; and he has since that time given the world a translation of a very curious MS. of the Historia Britonum, by Nennius, which he discovered in the library of the Vatican, and which he illustrated by such a series of notes as only the most extensive and recondite reading, aided by very sound observation, could have furnished. The same peculiar fulness of information in the notes is equally characteristic of the volume now before us. Both the one and the other of these publications owe their origin to the author's temporary residence at Rome, more than fifty years ago, when he devoted himself with great zeal to the examination of the treasures of art in that capital of the Christian world. and had the happiness in his researches to enjoy the company of the illustrious sculptor Flaxman, and to contract a friendship which only terminated with the life of that estimable artist. There are few men who have not had occasion to remark, with great concern, the evil effects produced on the moral feelings of age by the follies and vices of youth: the human mind is too apt to resemble the cask of the fabulist, which preserves to the end of its existence the taint imparted by its first contents. It is the more consolatory, therefore, to meet with instances where such contents offensive odour; or, if we may have recourse to a different metaphor, where the evening hours of existence are irradiated and warmed by the reflection of those beams which poured their full flood of golden light upon the noon of life, and where the pursuits of taste and science, on which Cicero, in his defence of Archias, has pronounced so splendid a eulogium, answer the great end proposed by the Roman orator, to glad our youth, delight our age, and crown our hoary hairs.

The work at the head of this article, under the quaint but expressive title of Cartonensia. does not confine itself, as might be supposed. to what are commonly known by the name of the Cartoons of Raphael, so long objects of admiration in England; but, taking a wider range, embraces the whole of the series of designs by that artist, of which our only remaining mementos are the tapestries in the Vatican. the original drawings having long since perished by time, or accident, or neglect. "Of these tapestries," Mr. Gunn very truly observes, "but little is known in this country, except from the cartoons of seven of them preserved at Hampton Court, and from an eighth, which formed one of the divisions of the " Massacre of the Innocents," and is now in the possession of Prince Hoare, Esq. And yet," he adds, "these manifestations of Raphael's genius rank among the most distinguished efforts of the short-lived period of fine painting in Italy; and from the inspection of them no attentive observer ever turned without deriving moral and intellectual benefit." Observations like these naturally call forth the inquiry, how it can possibly have happened that, if such a culogium is well founded, the objects that gave rise to it can have been allowed to remain in such comparative neglect; the only engravings of them that are known to exist being by a German of the name of Sommerau, an artist so obscure, that even his name is not to be found in the Dictionaries of Strutt or Bryan. Two reasons may be assigned for this: the one, which will occur to every person who has visited Rome, that the number of objects of interest in that capital is so great, as to be altogether overpowering, and hence they are illustrated less than those of any other place. The other reason is to be sought for in the character of the modern Romans, with whom the dolce far niente may almost be considered as the summum bonum of existence; the delightful climate inviting to indolence, and the happy country supplying at small expense whatever is required for their contracted wants and wishes. A further consideration may also possibly have had some influence—that what we now possess are not the originals from the master's hand; so that any graphic representation of them could but be the copy of a copy, and therefore less deserving the toil.

A question of this nature would lead us into so wide a discussion, that we must decline to enter upon it. Returning, therefore, to the contents of the work, we have to add that, after having given a brief sketch of the life of Raphael, and an historical and descriptive account of the tapestries themselves, the author concludes with two disquisitions, on which he has evidently bestowed great attention, and worked singularly con amore: the first of them mainly intended to illustrate the principle styled To zaker by Plato; the latter devoted to a discussion of the causes which have retarded the progress of the higher department of art in have left behind them a grateful instead of an the lover of art have long accustomed themselves to associate whatever is graceful, pure, and lovely-whatever may awaken the finest feelings of our nature by the most consummate knowledge of design and skill in composition. as well as by the utmost powers of expression. He was one of those master-spirits which Providence allows to appear occasionally upon earth, as an example to the rest of mankind of what their natures are capable. In this point of view he is set before us by Mr. Gunn; but, above all, as a painter calculated to improve the moral feeling by a continual exhibition of the noblest truths under the most lovely formsindeed, it were injustice to the reverend author of the Cartonensia to conceal that, however his work is calculated to improve the taste and delight the mind by inspiring a love for the arts, it has obviously in every portion of it the nobler end of amending the heart by making the muses the handmaids of virtue.

Those among our readers who have trodden the immortal city, cannot fail to have learned from their ciceroni, that the tapestries in question are accounted among the choice treasures of the Vatican, in one of the halls of which palace they are now constantly exposed to the view of the curious. How many there were originally of them is a point on which the learned are not agreed; but, as the author of Le Ceremoniali gives us a list of twenty-five, we are bound to believe that there was at least that number. Succeeding writers enumerate only twenty-three; and at present they are reduced to twenty-two — one of them, the "Descent of Christ into Limbus," having been destroyed during the troubles in Italy in the year 1798. But few words will suffice to give an outline of their history, which is in some respects curious. They owe their origin to Pope Leo X., who, ever anxious to let slip no opportunity of adding to the decorations of his palaces, gave orders to Raphael to make a series of drawings from subjects taken out of the New Testament. with the express view of their being copied in tapestry; so to form " a set of the richest hangings of silk and gold that it was in the power of art to produce." The designs thus made, received the appellation of Cartoons, as well from their great size as from the material on which they were wrought; and they were sent to Antwerp, there to be woven under the superintendence of two Flemings who had been for some years pupils of Raphael at Rome, Bernard van Orlay and Michael Coxis. The sum paid for the weaving of them is said to have been 70,000 crowns, equal to nearly £18,000 of our money; and tradition further reports, that Francis I. of France defrayed the cost, in consideration of the canonisation of his namesake, St. Francis of Paola, the founder of the order of Minims. In the sack of Rome in 1526, the tapestries were carried off as part of the plunder; but they did not long continue the property of the victors, for, as the borders of two of them testify, they were restored by Anne di Montmorenci, in the reign of Julius III. At a period not long subsequent they were first exhibited, as an object worthy of public admiration, by Pope Paul IV., who, about the middle of the same century, introduced the custom of annually suspending them on the festival of Corpus Domini before the Basilica of St. Peter. The same custom was likewise observed upon the solemn function of beatification—the announcement in the Roman church that a saint is enrolled in heaven; a England.

With the name of Raphael, the painter and tion. Upon the occupation of Rome by the French in 1798, the tapestries were subjected; of the collection, is probably to be mainly attri- | Christ himself, kept and preserved; for it was to a second and longer expatriation; and it was buted to this very circumstance; or it is pos- an ancient custom among the heathens,' he on this occasion that, as we have just noticed, sible, as Horace Walpole shrewdly suspects, continues, 'to honour those after this manner on this occasion that, as we have just noticed, one of them was destroyed, having fallen a victim to the cupidity of a Jew at Leghorn, who bought them with a view of reducing them to ashes for the sake of the gold and silver they contained, but happily found so small a quantity in that which he subjected to the experiment, that he was not encouraged to make trial of the rest. The remainder were purchased by M. Devanx, and given back to Pius VII. in 1814.

In speaking of the tapestries at the Vatican. we have regarded them as the only set in existence from the designs of Raphael; and, in truth, we know of no other complete series. At the same time, we have little doubt but that others might be found; for it is in the highest degree improbable that, the manufactory having once been set to work on such subjects from the hand of an artist of so high a character, and under the patronage of a pontiff like Leo, this single commission should alone have been executed. And those who are acquainted with the interior of palaces cannot but be aware how, amidst the abundance of their treasures, objects of the most curious description are often crowded into drawers, and there suffered to remain till their very existence is forgotten, and they are either brought to light by some lucky socident, or, blattarum ac tinearum epula, they perish. We ourselves have seen various subjects from these tapestries in the houses of several of the British nobility. We could even point out some, as at Burleigh and Ford Abbey, which have escaped the notice of Mr. Gunn, who has, with much industry, collected a considerable quantity of information on this subject. To trace the fate of the original cartoons would be a far more interesting inquiry; and whoever could ascertain the existence of any beyond the eight known to be in England, would justly claim to be enshrined among the benefactors to the arts. But here, unfortunately, there remains no thread wherewith to pursue our investigation. What is most probable is, that they were destroyed, as no longer of any value, after the more durable and more brilliant copies of them had been completed; and this supposition derives strength from the well-known fact of detached figures which appear to have belonged to them having occasionally been brought to sale at the dispersion of the collections of the curious, particularly those of Dorigny and Richardson. It was thus that Mr. Flaxman obtained the head supposed to have belonged to the "Massacre of the Innocents;" and thus may we account for the fragments preserved in the Guise Gallery at Oxford. To Rubens this country is indebted for the possession of the cartoons at Hampton Court. The wasteful pontiff appears to have been unable to pay at once for the tapestries woven from them; and the manufacturers consequently disposed of the original designs to recompense themselves in some measure for their loss. At such a juncture, Rubens recommended the purchase of them to his liberal patron, Charles I.; and it is a curious proof of the different degree of estimation in which the talents of Rubens and Raphael were then held, that while the king agreed to pay the former no less a sum than £80,000 for illustrating the Banqueting-house at Whitehall, these far more precions relics were, in the appraisement of the royal galleries made by order of parliament in 1649, estimated at only £300! That they were not then sold and conveyed into some and further, that he had seen pictures of the hausted by suffering, and devoid of grace and foreign country, together with the greater part apostles, as of St. Peter and St. Paul, and of majesty. To the Latins, among whom the

that the low value affixed to these was not without connivance:—" It may appear remarkable," he observes, "that these, the most capionly £300, when the nine pieces, representing the triumphs of Julius Cæsar, done by Andrea da Montegna, were valued at £1,000; and a Madonna by Raphael was sold for £2,000. But when we are informed that they were bought by his highness (Cromwell), who, as soon as he was possessed of the sole power, stopped any farther dispersion of the royal collection, and who, even in this trifling instance, gave an indication of his views-it will not seem extraordinary that so powerful a person should be favoured in the valuation of them."

The description of the tapestries is far from being, in our estimation, the least valuable or the least interesting portion of the Cartonensia. Mr. Gunn enters upon this part of his subject with so much true pictorial feeling and knowledge, that we can hardly bring ourselves to believe that he has not himself been at some period of his life an artist. It were injustice both to him and to our readers not to transcribe his account of some one of them, as a specimen of the work; and we have selected for our purpose that entitled the "Ascension of our Lord," not as affording a proof of what we have just remarked, but as a striking instance of the curiosa felicitas of the author, and the multifarious learning displayed in discussing a subject of great interest to the Christian world, but which we do not recollect to have seen treated of elsewhere-the existence of any contemporary or nearly contemporary portrait of our Saviour.

"The twelfth subject, and one of the most remarkable of these compositions, is the 'Ascension,' which, from the form required, naturally exceeds the others in height. Our Lord appears in the heavens, accompanied by two angels, having just quitted his disciples, who occupy the lower part of the picture. One sentiment pervades all the characters-astonishment, mixed with respect and adoration. All are on their knees, or ready to kneel; all direct their eyes to the same spot in a uniformity of position, of attitude, and of feeling. A great attraction of this design is the head of our Saviour, the adequate representation of which has often fruitlessly exercised the talent of artists. Leonardo da Vinci and Raphael have been most sucressful in the attempt. As is well known, these were men of deep research and pre-eminent powers; and, though they lived more than fifteen centuries after the commencement of the Christian era, it may be conceived that their ideas were aided by original imitations existing even in their days; and that such did really exist, we are justified in believing. Irenæus, who was born as early as the year 130, says, that the Carpocratians exhibited both statues and pictures of our Saviour, and that Pilate had caused a likeness to be painted of him. Tertullian speaks of the intention of Tiberius to assign a place to our Saviour among the deities of Rome, as a thing publicly and commonly known. Eusebius relates, that there was, in his time, in the city of Casarea Philippi, a group of bronze figures, representing Christ and the woman whom he had cured, and proceeds- we are not to be surprised that the Gentiles should raise a monument to those who were cured by our Saviour; continues, 'to honour those after this manner who had benefited their country.' Zozomen, too, reports that Julian, who lived at the same time, took down the statue of Christ, to withtal designs in the world, should be appraised at draw the people from idolatry, and in order to substitute his own. It is not essential to my purpose that these details should be literally true; but we cannot deny the existence of what men like these declare that they have seen. The same gratitude and veneration which prompted the early Christians to preserve a resemblance of their Lord, would operate equally in making them hand down his features to posterity. The impulse is natural, and has been observed from remote antiquity; and the heads of Socrates and Plato, for instance, are as well known to us now as they were to their contemporaries. If, therefore, we can produce a por-trait of Christ of the time of Zozomen, the latest of the four writers above quoted, may we not fairly conclude it to be a faithful resemblance? One of these was within these few years to be seen in the Basilica of St. Paul, in the Via Ostiense, before that structure was destroyed by fire. The situation of it was over the Arcus Triumphalis; and it possessed traits of benign majesty beyond what we observe in common mortals. It was executed in mosaic, an art practised through every period at Rome, and which is almost as indestructible as the building it adorned. The date of the edifice was verified by an inscription, by which we learn that it was dedicated to Placidia, the mother of Valentinian the Third, A.D. 441. When at Rome, I was very careful in collecting the opinions of persons best qualified to judge concerning this portrait. I have viewed it with our own Flaxman, — 'himself a host;'-and every one whom I consulted concurred in the belief of its being a genuine remain. A question will instantly suggest itself to the reader, 'Why was not the portrait of Christ uniformly continued among the faithful, with the same accuracy as those of Socrates and Plato?' One reason might be found in the wide diffusion of the Christian religion through so many countries of different manners, habits, and ideas; each of whom would naturally represent the countenance of the Redeemer under the similitude most congenial to their own minds and feelings, although the true effigy might still be preserved in the capital of the western church, such as we presume to be the portrait once existing in the church of St. Paul. Another cause might be, that in the early periods of the Christian faith, the cross was represented simply, as it was in imagination seen by Constantine. This sacred symbol was at times rendered significant by the accompaniment of a gemmed, or laurelled crown, held over it by a hand from the clouds, with A and Ω. The body of Christ was not represented on the cross till the seventh century. It was first so admitted in the western church, with the head bowed down; whereas in the eastern (though not without some exceptions,) the face was lifted up. In the latter, the effigy of Christ is first seen on a Byzantine coin, struck in the reign of Justinian the Second, 685-695; previously to which time we find only crosses and anagrams. The Greeks, indeed, reluctantly yielded to an innovation which they deemed degrading to the Divine character, and rarely, if ever, exposed the Saviour of mankind (and how barbarous the exposure!) to open view, nailed to the cross, crowned with thorns, examong the Greeks, and whose ideas were there-improvement and pleasure. Old as he is, we fore more on a level with common life, this trust Mr. Gunn will give us an opportunity of mournful character of the 'Man of Sorrows', returning to his labours on a future occasion; was more congenial. Anxious to render the and we will now only address him in the words subject in the highest degree affecting, and to of Linnaus's beautiful apostrophe to the Lapbring it home to the feelings of every one, lander: "Ducas, O beate senex, innocentissiunder national configuration, attempts to be mos tuos aunos ultra centenarium numerum pathetic degenerated into low life; and a system facili senectute et summa sanitate! tem of worship was inculcated, which addressed itself more to the passions than to the understanding of its votaries. In the aspect of the author of my redemption, let me not contemplate a mortal sinking under infirmities like those to which I feel myself exposed, but a being who animates me with hope, and inspires me with a confidence which enables me to exult in the consciousness that 'my Redeemer liveth!

"Respecting the unsatisfactory feeling usually conveyed by a view of the countenance of our Redeemer, it must be admitted that those who have not had the advantage of surveying fine pictures, are able to conceive only a very imperfect idea of them from copies in oil, or from a paper would have been thought likely to be engravings. In an engraving, for instance, the popular. We select one or two chance anecpicture has to pass through the conceptions and the hand of the copier, the designer, and the engraver. The works of man partake of himself, to a degree of which we are not aware; for, as one cannot see with the eyes of another. so he only who can comprehend with another man's understanding, and whose cast of mind nearest assimilates to the painter he would imitate, has a chance of being faithful to the original. Where this advantage does not occur, we are presented only with a mannered attempt of his own. Hence it is that the heads of Christ, copied from the two masters now about to be quoted, are deficient in correctness and sublimity; although the fault does not rest with the mind of the master, but is rather to be found in the insufficiency of his copyist.

"The first of these is Leonardo da Vinci. The diffidence of this wonderful man was equal to his talents. When he conceived the 'Cina.' he felt and acknowledged the difficulty of the undertaking, 'Non pensando poterle dare quella divinità celeste che all' imagine di Christo si richiede.' The attempt concentrated all his powers; and he therein achieved as much as could be done by man. The same diffidence was felt by Raphael himself, when he conceived the 'Transfiguration,' which he painted with his own hand, and wherein the head of the Redeemer was reserved for his last touches. 'Lasciando a finire per l'ultima cosa la faccia del Salvatore, volle egli in quel sacro volto unire insieme ogni sua abilità, e fare, siccome fece, siccome fece, gli ultimi sforzi dell' arte.'

'Lavater was so captivated with the idea, that he has left us the following effusion: "Ah! si l'antiquité nous avoit transmis un profil exact de ce divin Jésus, que cette image seroit chère à mon cœur! Je sacrifierois tout pour la posséder: elle seroit pour moi le monument le plus auguste et le plus saint. Oui, je reconnoîtrois dans ses traits célestes le témoignage des vérités qu'il nous a laissées. J'y retrouverois tout le caractère de son Evangile; et cette preuve parleroit mieux à mon esprit que les versions les plus fidèles, que les manuscrits originaux mêmes.' "

We should gladly extend our observations to the disquisitions which conclude this volume; but we feel that we have already allotted to it as much space as the nature of our publication will admit; and we therefore reluctantly pass unnoticed this portion of the Cartonensia; from

Le Livre des Cent-et-Un, Tom. III. Paris. 1832, L'Advocat; London, Dulau.

WE like this volume better than its predecessors; and among the articles which have pleased us, we must mention, " The Duel," by Victor Ducange; "Les jeunes Filles de Paris," by Bouilly, with whose tales most of our young readers are familiar; and "Une Séance de Sourds-Muets," a most interesting paper. "Le Cour de Paris" is a sketch in which the amiability of the young Duke of Bourdeaux is placed in a very attractive point of view. We suspect a little change must have taken place in that " superbe volonté," public opinion, before such dotes. In a lively contrast of the past and present state of dramatic art, the following is told of the celebrated actor Molé. "Some fifty years ago he was dangerously ill, and scarcely an equipage in Paris which was not daily seen at his door. At length these inquiries were rewarded by the news of his recovery, and that the physicians had permitted him to take a few drops of Burgundy. In the course of the next two days he had upwards of four thousand bottles sent to him." Verily, it was worth while to be ill.

Conjugal regrets. - "When you have past the barrier of Mount Parnassus, you see on the left side of the Boulevard, almost opposite, the name of Guerin, in large letters. It is an alehouse of some note. You may vow never to enter it, but you cannot be very certain that it is not in your fate to remain once, at least, at the door. It is the ordinary rendezvous of the undertakers belonging to Mount Parnassus; and usually the hearse is stationary for a short while before it. It is almost the only place where your inconsolable husbands take 'a drop of comfort,' after having been to fling flowers on the grave of their wives. Two friends were seated at a little table, having drank and laughed themselves into feelings of great sociability. Seeing an acquaintance pass by, they eagerly insisted on his joining in their festivity. 'Impossible,' said he; 'to-day is the anniversary of my wife's death, and I have promised Polito that we will go and weep over her grave.' He was leading a little boy, of about six years old, who held a wreath of immortals in his hand. However, gaiety is very contagious, and our widower thought it mattered not whether the flowers were scattered over his wife's tomb half an hour sooner or later. Down he sat, and 'three merry men I trow were we.' The only interruption to their enjoyment was the teasing of the child, who kept worrying, 'I will go and cry over mamma. ' Be quiet; we can't go now,' said the father, whose own sorrow was yielding to the influence of wine, the comforter. 'I will go and cry over mamma.' 'I tell you you shan't; you have been a great deal too naughty the whole week for any such indulgence." Well, the boy kept worrying, till at last the disconsolate widower, provoked beyond all patience, gave the child a good thrashing - and then got drunk. The flowers which were to have been the table; and so ended the anniversary of my poor dear wife's death.'

We conclude with an epitaph, whose simple piety is to us very touching. "Here lies Velina le Dunois, aged five years and a half. Dear child, pray for us."

Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali's Observations on the Mussulmauns of India.

[Third Notice-]

CONTINUING to examine this work, chiefly for the characteristic traits, which it so unaffectedly and abundantly supplies, relative to the domestic economy and habits of the Mahometans in India, we need not preface our selections with many remarks. They speak for themselves; and though the writer shews a sincere partiality for those with whom she was thus intimately connected, they seem to deserve almost implicit confidence, whether considered as pictures of society or observations on the professors of the Mussulmaun faith.

" The nautchunies (the author tells us) are entirely excluded from the female apartments of the better sort of people; no respectable Mussulmann would allow these imprudent women to perform before their wives and daughters. But (she continues) I must speak of the Domenie, who are the singers and dancers admitted within the pale of zeenahnah life. These, on the contrary, are women of good character, and their songs are of the most chaste description, chiefly in the Hindoostaunie tongue. They are instructed in native music, and play on the instruments in common use with some taste, as the saattarah (guitar) with three wire strings, the surringhee (rude-shaped violin), the dhome or dholle (drum), in many varieties, beaten with the fingers, never with sticks. The harmony produced is melancholy, and not unpleasing, but at best all who form the several classes of professors in native societies are indifferent musicians. Amateur performers are very rare amongst the Mussulmauns; indeed, it is considered indecorous in either sex to practise music, singing, or dancing; and such is the prejudice on their minds against this happy resource amongst genteel people of other climates, that they can never reconcile themselves to the propriety of the 'Sahib Logne' (a term in general use for the English people visiting India) figuring away in a quadrille or country dance. The nobles and gentlemen are frequently invited to witness a 'station ball;' they look with surprise at the dancers, and I have often been asked, why I did not persuade my countrywomen that they were doing wrong. 'Why do the people fa-tigue themselves, who can so well afford to hire dancers for their amusement?' Such is the difference between people of opposite views in their modes of pleasing themselves: a native gentleman would consider himself disgraced or insulted by the simple inquiry, ' Can you dance, sing, or play?'

We are pretty often much of the Oriental opinion, when we see great grown-up persons figuring away, doing the graceful and light fantastic on our ball-room floors. The following is an Indian lesson on a branch of political economy.

"The chuckee is two flat circular stones (resembling grindstones in England), the upper stone has a peg or handle fixed in it, near the edge, with which it is forced round by the person grinding, who is seated on the floor: the corn is thrown in through a circular hole on the upper stone, and the flour works out at the the perusal of which we confidently assure our strewed over the grave were scattered under edges between the two stones. This is the only method of grinding corn for the immense population throughout Oude, and most other parts of Hindoostaun, even to the present day. The late king of Oude, Ghauzie ood deen Hyder, was at one time much pressed by some English friends of his to introduce water-mills, for the purpose of grinding corn: he often spoke of the proposed plan to the Meer, and declared his sole motive for declining the improvement was, the consideration he had for the poor women, who by this employment made an excellent living in every town and village, and who must, by the introduction of mills, be distressed for the means of support. 'My poor women,' he would often say, 'shall never have cause to reproach me for depriving them of the use and benefit of their chuckee."

"All Mussulmauns performing the pilgrimage pay a kind of tax to the Sheruff of Mecca. The present possessors of power in Mecca are of the Soonie sect. The admission money, in consequence, falls heavy on the Sheahs, from whom they exact heavy sums, out of jealousy and prejudice. This renders it difficult for the poor Sheah pilgrim to gain admittance, and it is even suspected that in many cases they are induced to falsify themselves, when it is demanded of them what sect they belong to, rather than be denied entrance after their severe trial to reach the confines of Mecca. The tax levied on the Soonies is said to be trifling in proportion to that of the Sheahs. *

"On the subject of Zuckhaut, commanded by Mahumud to his followers, I shall have little to remark. The nature of the institute is intended to oblige mankind to share with the poor a due portion of those benefits they have received through the bounty of Divine Providence. Every Mussulmann is expected by this law to set apart from his annual income one-fortieth part, denominated Zuckhaut (God's portion), for the sole benefit of the poor. I believe there are not many-judging by what I have witnessed amongst the Mussulmaun population of Hindoostaun-who do not expend a much larger portion of their yearly income in charitable donations than the enjoined fortieth part. The poor Syands are not allowed to receive any relief from 'the Zuckhaut;' they being of the prophet's blood, are not to be included with the indigent for whom these donations are generally set apart. The strict Mussulmaun of the Sheah sect usually deducts one-tenth from whatever money comes into his possession, as 'the Syaads' due,' to whom it is distributed, as proper objects present themselves to his knowledge; much in the same way as the tribe of Levi are entitled to the tenth of the produce from their brethren of Israel by the Mosaic law. The Syaads are likewise restricted from accepting many other ladies for their friends are tastefully set out, charitable offerings—sutkah, for instance; by which is meant the several things composing peace-offerings, offerings in atonement, &c.
The better to explain this, I must here describe some of the habits of the Mussulmann popula-When any person escapes from a threatened danger or accident, their friends send offerings of corn, oil, and money; all that is thus sent to the person preserved must be touched by his hand, and then distributed amongst the poor and needy. If any member of a family be ill, a tray is filled with corn, and some money laid on it; it is then placed under the bed of the sick person for the night; in the morning this is to be distributed amongst the poor. Some people cook bread, and place it in the same way with money under the bed of the sick. All these things are called Sutkah, in whatever form they are planned, which is done in a variety of ways; and when distributed to the poor, are never to be offered to, nor allowed to be accepted by, the Syand race. The scape-goat, an animal in good health and without blemish, is another offering of the Sutkah denomination-a Syaad is not allowed to be one of the number to run after the goat released from the sick-chamber. When any one is going a journey, the friends send bands of silk or riband, in the folds of which are secured silver or gold coins; these are to be tied on the arm of the person projecting the journey; and such offerings are called 'Emaum Zaumunee,' or the Emaum's protection. Should the traveller be distressed on his journey, he may, without blame, make use of any such deposits tied on his arm, but only in emergencies-none such occurring, he is expected, when his journey is accomplished in safety, to divide all these offerings of his friends amongst righteous people. The Syaads may accept these gifts, such being considered holy: paak is the original word used-literally, clean. *

" 'Nou-Roze' (New-year's Day) is a festival or eade of no mean importance in the estimation of Mussulmaun society. The exact period of commencing the Mussulmaun new year is the very moment of the sun's entering the sign Aries. This is calculated by those practical astronomers who are in the service of most great men in native cities-I should tell you they have not the benefit of published almanacks as in England; and according to the hour of the day or night when the sun passes into that particular sign, so are they directed in the choice of a colour to be worn in their garments on this eade-if at midnight, the colour would be dark puce, almost a black; if at mid-day, the colour would be the brightest crimson. Thus, to the intermediate hours are given a shade of either colour applicable to the time of the night or the day when the sun enters the sign Aries; and whatever be the colour to suit the hour of Nou-Roze, all classes wear the day's livery, from the king to the meanest subject in the city. The king, on his throne, sits in state to receive congratulations and nuzzas from his nobles, courtiers, and dependants. 'Mahaarukh Nou-Roze!' (may the new-year be fortunate!) are the terms of saluking himself setting the example. The day is devoted to amusements, a public breakfast at the palace, sending presents, exchanging visits, &c. The trays of presents prepared by the and the work of many days' previous arrangement. Eggs are boiled hard—some of these papers; others are neatly painted in figures and devices, many are ornamented with gilding-every lady evincing her own peculiar taste in the prepared eggs for 'Nou-Roze.' All kinds of dried fruits and nuts, confectionary and cakes, are numbered amongst the necessary articles for this day's offering; they are set out in small earthen plates, lacquered over to resemble silver, on which is placed coloured paper, cut out in curious devices (an excellent substitute for vine leaves) laid on the plate to receive the several articles forming 'Nou-Roze' presents. Amongst the young people these trays are looked forward to with child-like trays are looked forward to with child-like tom, though strongly partaking of the superanxiety. The ladies rival each other in their stitious, is not so blamable as that which I display of novelty and good taste, both in the have known practised by some men of esteemed eatables and the manner of setting them off with effect. The religious community have prayers read in their family, and by them it is considered both a necessary duty and a propitious commencement to bring in the new year by 'prayer and praises.' When it is known that the Nou-Roze will occur by daylight, the ladies have a custom of watching for the moment the year shall commence by a fresh rose, which being plucked from the stalk is thrown into a basin of water, the eye downwards. They say, this rose turns over of itself towards the sun at the very moment of that luminary passing into the sign Aries. I have often found them thus engaged; but I never could say I witnessed the actual accomplishment of their prediction.

" The last month of the periodical rains is called Sahbaund. There is a custom observed by the Mussulmaun population, the origin of which has never been clearly explained to me; some say it is in remembrance of the prophet Elisha or Elijah, and commences the first Friday of Sahbaund, and is followed up every succeeding Friday through this concluding month of the rainy season. This ceremony may have had its origin with devout persons willing to honour or to invoke the prophet Elijah, who, as our Scripture informs us, 'prayed, and the clouds gave no rain for the space of three years; and again he prayed, and the heavens were opened to his prayer. Or in that of Elisha parting the waters with the mantle of Elijah, after succeeding him in the prophetic office, 2 Kings, ii. 14; or a still more probable event, calculated to excite the pious to some such annual notice as is observed with these people, in the same chapter, the twentieth and following verses, where we find it said of Elisha, 'And he said, bring me a new cruse, and put salt therein. And they brought it to him. And he went forth unto the spring of the waters, and cast the salt in there, and said, Thus saith the Lord, I have healed these waters; there shall not be from thence any more dearth or barren land. So the waters were healed unto this day, according to the saying of Elisha which he spake.' The learned men call it a zeenahnah, or children's custom; but it is common to see children of all ages amongst the males, partake of, and enjoy the festival with as much glee as the females or their juniors. A bamboo frame is formed to the shape of a Chinese boat; this framework is hidden by a covering of gold and silver tation exchanged by all classes of society, the tissue, silk, or coloured muslin, bordered and neatly ornamented with silver paper. In this light bark many lamps are secreted, of common earthenware. A procession is formed to convey the tribute, called 'Elias ky Kishter,' to the river. The servants of the family, soldiers, and a band of native music, attend in due order of march: the crowd attracted by this childish are stained in colours resembling our mottled play is immense, increasing as they advance through the several streets on the way to the river, by all the idlers of the place. The kishtee (boat) is launched amidst a flourish of trumpets and drums, and the shouts of the populace; the small vessel, being first well lighted, by means of the secreted lamps, moves down gently with the stream. When at a little distance, on a broad river, in the stillness of evening, any one-who did not previously know how these little moving bodies of light were produced-might fancy such fairy scenes as are to be met with in the well-told tables of children's books in happy England. This cus-good understanding, who having a particular object in view, which they cannot attain by any human stratagem or contrivance, write petitions to the Emaum Mhidhie on Fridays, and by their own hands commit the paper to the river, with as much reverence as if they thought him present in the water to receive it. The petition is always written in the same respectful terms, as inferiors here well know how to address their superiors; and every succeeding Friday the petition is repeated until the object is accomplished, or the petitioner has no further inducement to offer one. I have made particular inquiries whether such sensible people (as I have seen thus engaged) placed any dependence on this mode of petitioning. The only answer I have received, is, 'Those who think proper thus to petition, certainly believe that it will be effectual if they persevere in it.' The new moon is a festival in the family of every good Mussulmaun. They date the new moon from the evening it first becomes visible, and not as we do-from the moment it changes. The event is announced in native cities by firing salutes from the field-pieces of kings, nuwaubs, &c. Amongst the religious people there is much preparation in bathing and changing the dress against the evening the moon is expected to be visible; and when the guns have announced that it is visible, they have the Khoraun brought, which they open at the passage where Mahumud praises God for this particular blessing. A small looking-glass is then brought, on which passage it is placed, and the book held in such a position that the moon may be first seen by the person reflected in the glass. They then repeat the prayer expressly appointed for this occasion, and that done, the whole family rise and embrace each other, making salaams and reverence to their superiors and elders. The servants and slaves advance for the same purpose, and nothing is heard for some minutes, but ' May the new moon be fortunate!' reiterated from every mouth of the assembled family.

"What will be said of the singular custom, 'drinking the moon at a draught?' A silver basin being filled with water, is held in such a situation that the full moon may be reflected in it; the person to be benefited by this draught is required to look steadfastly at the moon in the basin, then shut his eyes and quaff the liquid at one draught. This remedy is advised by medical professors in nervous cases, and also for palpitations of the heart. I have seen this practised, but I am not aware of any real benefit derived by the patient from the prescription. When the planet Venus is in conjunction with the moon, they say the time is most favourable to offer prayers to God for any particular object they may have in view. At this time they write charms or talismans to be worn by children. I remember having witnessed a gentleman thus occupied, who wrote little scraps in the Arabic character to distribute amongst the children of his friends, who wore them enclosed in silver cases on their arms. An eclipse of the moon is an event of great interest both with the Mussulmaun and the Hindoo population, although they have very opposite ideas of the causes of an eclipse. Many of the notions entertained by the lower classes of Mussulmauns upon the nature of an eclipse are borrowed from the Hindoos. Some think that it is caused by the anger of God towards the people of the earth; others say the moon is in debt, and many other equally odd conceits exist amongst the ignorant people, and among them view an eclipse, or any other phenomenon of nature, without the same feeling of awe, although all are not equally ready to express the sensation? Loud cries from the mixed population, Mussulmauns and Hindoos, announce the commencement of an eclipse, whether it be of the sun or the moon. The voice of the Mussulmaun is distinguished by the Namaazies' call to prayers — 'Allah wo uckbaar!' (God alone is great!) To this summons the faithful attend diligently, and they are generally occupied in the form of prayer appointed by Mahumud until the shadow has passed over the sun or moon eclipsed. The ladies prepare offerings of corn, oil, and money, to be distributed amongst the poor. The gentlemen give presents to the needy. The astronomer who predicts to his royal or noble master the exact period of an eclipse, is rewarded, when it is over, with money, a dress, and a crescent of pure gold in some instances. A bride elect sends sutkah to her intended husband, accompanied by a goat or kid, which must be tied to the leg of his bedstead during the continuance of an eclipse: these offerings are afterwards distributed in charity. Women expecting to become mothers are carefully kept awake during an eclipse, as they declare the infant's security depends on the mother being kept from sleep; they are not allowed to use a needle, scissors, knife, or any other instrument, during an eclipse, for fear of drawing blood, which would be injurious at that period, both to the mother and child; neither are the animals in a similar state neglected; a mixture of cow-dung and drugs is rubbed over the belly of such animals, whether cows, sheep, goats, &c., and all these are securely housed until the planet is again resplendent: they fancy that both the animal and its young would be endangered by exposure during the time of the eclipse. The power of the moon on wounded persons is believed universally to be of dangerous tendency. I have heard many extraordinary relations by people who, as they tell me, have suffered from exposure to the moon whilst a wound was fresh. One person had received a severe sabre-cut on his arm; the place was sewed up by the barber (the only surgeon among the natives), and being much exhausted, he lay down to sleep in the open air. The moon was near the full, and after some hours' exposure to her influence he awoke in great agony; the barber examined the arm early in the morning, and found the cut in a state of corruption, the sewing having burst; the wound was cleansed, and dressed with pounded camphor; the place eventually healed, and the man lived many years to tell his story, always declaring his belief that the moon had been the cause of his sufferings; he was the more certain of this, as he dreamed, whilst exposed to her influence, that a large black woman (an inhabitant of the moon) had wrestled with him, and hurt his wound. The usual application in India to a fresh wound is that of slacked lime. A man in our employ was breaking wood, the head of the hatchet came off, and the sharp edge fell with considerable force, on the poor creature's foot; he bled profusely and fainted: lime was unsparingly applied to the wound, the foot carefully wrapped up, and the man conveyed to his hut on a charpoy (hedstead), where he was kept quiet without disturbing the wound; at the end of a fortnight he walked about, and in another week returned to his labour. Lime is an article of made into a thin paste, and immediately applied and repeatedly moistened, will speedily remove the effects of a burn; and if applied later, even when a blister has risen, the remedy never fails: I cannot say how it might act on a wound, the consequence of a neglected burn.

With these interesting and curious extracts we again close the volume.

Memoirs of the Duchess d'Abrantes. [Conclusion.]

WE could not confine our review of this work even within the year 1831; and are therefore obliged to borrow a page of 1832 for its conclusion. Among the scenes characteristic of French manners, and of the early days of Buonaparte, the following history of the ball given by Madame de Permon on her daughter's marriage is so singularly characteristic, that we shall give it at length. Madame de Permon is planning her invitations:-

Junot took the pen, and wrote down all the names of the ladies, beginning with Madame Bonaparte and Mademoiselle de Beauharnais. He then waited for the name with which my mother would commence the list of gentlemen. 'The First Consul of the French Republic, one and indivisible; is not that the style?' said my mother. 'The first consul!' we all exclaimed together. 'Yes, the first consul: is there any thing astonishing in that? I am tired of being on bad terms with any one, and besides —' 'And besides,' said Junot, laughing, 'you think that perhaps you were more in the wrong than he.' No. no. said my mother, 'that is quite another affair. He was in the wrong altogether: but I considered, that as Laurette might be daily in his society, these sort of quarrels might produce disagreeable effects for her, and I wished to prevent that: was I not right?' We embraced her. 'But the invitation,' she added, 'is not all: do you think he will accept it? - do you think he will come?' 'I am sure of it. Only name the hour that will suit you best, and I will come to fetch you,' said Junot, enchanted at this prospect of reconciliation between his mother-in-law and his beloved general. My mother looked at him with an air of astonishment perfectly laughable. 'Fetch me __ to go where?' 'Where!' returned Junot, as much surprised in his turn; 'to the Tuileries, to tender your invitation to the first consul and Madame Bonaparte.' 'My dear Junot,' said my mother, with the utmost seriousness and sang-froid, 'you are quite, perfectly mad.' 'It seems to me, mamma, that what I say is, nevertheless, very sensible; that nothing, in fact, can be more reasonable,' replied Junot, somewhat disconcerted by the apostrophe. And I tell you you are mad. Would you have me go to request General Bonaparte to come again to my house, after having forbidden his appearance there? 'How, then, do you propose to invite him?' asked Junot, with an accent impossible to describe. 'Truly, how should I invite him, but precisely the same as I do every one else, except that the card shall be all in writing? and I will write it all in my own neat hand, which he knows perfectly well.' Junot strode up and down the room, exclaiming, 'But that cannot be ! You had better not invite him at all! He will think that you intend him a disrespect.' 'He would be much mistaken, then. But he would think no such great service in the domestic economy of the thing; and you will see, that after having renatives. I have experienced the good effects ceived my note of invitation, he will do as all only. Yet a sensation of awe is felt by most; of this simple remedy for burns or scalds: equal well-bred men would: he will call on me before and where is the intelligent creature who can proportions of lime, water, and any kind of oil, the ball, or at least he will have a card left at the door.' 'Do you think, then,' said Junot, | mother gave him her's, and they entered the | her appearance produced. Her entrance seemed in the utmost amazement, 'that he keeps visiting cards?' 'And why not? My dear child, because Bonaparte gains battles, is that any reason that he should not visit?"

The young couple, however, more prudently wait on the first consul, to make their request in person. "When the door was opened, and the first consul saw me, he said, smiling very good-hu-mouredly, 'What means this family deputation? There is only Madame Permon wanting to its completion. Is she afraid of the Tuile-ries, or of me?' 'My general,' said my hus-band immediately, 'Madame Permon would gladly have joined us, but she is very ill, and finds it impossible to leave her chamber, to come to request a favour of you, which now she is very desirous to obtain. My wife is charged to address to you her petition in form. The first consul turned towards me with a smile, saying, 'Well, let me hear! What do you wish for?' It is difficult, if not impossible, to describe the charm of his countenance, when he smiled with a feeling of benevolence. His soul was upon his lips and in his eves. The magic power of that expression at a later period is well known; the Emperor of Russia had experienced it, when he said to me, 'I never loved any one more than that man.' I told the general what had been agreed upon, and had scarcely ended my little harangue, when he took my two hands, and said, 'Well, I shall certainly be at this ball: why did you appear to expect I should refuse? I shall go most willingly. Then he added a phrase which he often re-peated, 'Though I shall be in the midst of my enemies; for your mother's drawing-room, they tell me, is full of them.' Junot now made a sign to us to take leave; we accordingly made our parting salutations, and the first consul, after pressing my brother's hand with as much cordiality as if we were still in my father's house, inquired on what day this ball should take place. 'Next Monday, general; it is, I believe, the 10th of November.' 'What! the 10th of November?' said the first consul, going to his scrutoire; 'that seems to me to be some particular day—let me see;' and as he spoke, 10th of November is the anniversary of the 18th Brumaire, and I cannot join a party on that day. And your mother will have no company; your acquaintance of the fauxbourg Saint Germain will certainly not quit their retreats to make a festival of the anniversary of the reestablishment of the republic. What concerns me personally,' and his countenance, as he spoke, assumed an expression serious and severe, 'is of little consequence, but I must see the republic respected: it would not, therefore, be suitable that the anniversary of the day which re-stored it to us entire, should be celebrated otherwise than as a family festival. I do not refuse Madame Permon's invitation, if you will name another day.' "

The important evening comes, and with it the general.

"At a few minutes before eleven, the trampling of the first consul's horse-guards was heard. Very soon afterwards the carriage drove up to the door, and almost immediately he appeared at the entrance of the dining-room, with Albert and Junot, who had received him in the hall. My mother advanced towards him, and saluted him with her most courteous obei-sance; to which he replied with a smile, 'Eh, Madame Permon, is that how you receive an old friend?' and held out his hand. My favour.

ball-room together. The heat was excessive. The first consul remarked it, but without taking off his grey great-coat; and was on the point of making the tour of the room, but his eagle eye had already observed, that of the many ladies present some had not risen at his entrance. He was offended, and passed immediately into the bed-room, still retaining my mother's arm, and appearing to look at her with admiration. Dancing had been discontinued as soon as he appeared, and Bonaparte soon perceived it, by the stillness of the saloon, from whence issued only the murmuring sounds produced by the observations made upon him in an under tone. 'Pray, Madame Permon,' said he, 'let the dancing be resumed; young people must be amused, and dancing is their favourite pastime. I am told, by the by, that your daughter's dancing equals Mademoiselle Chameroi's. I must see it; and if you will, you and I will dance the monaco, the only one I know.' 'I have not danced these thirty years,' replied my mother. 'Oh, you are jesting! You look to-night like your daughter's sister.'

From such extracts it will be seen that. independently of the great interest attached to any details of Napoleon, these volumes are very amusing, from the lively sketches of French society in which they abound. Madame de Permon herself, with her beauty, her grace, her petulance, and her prejudices, is the very beau idéal of a French woman.

The following scene could only have occurred in a Parisian ball-room.

" Madame Leclerc informed us that she had prepared for the occasion a dress, which, to use her own expression, she expected would immortalise her. This dress was a subject of the most serious consideration with her for a week before she was destined to wear it, and she enjoined the strictest secrecy on Madame Germon and Charbonnier. She requested permission to dress at our house, which she frequently did, in order that she might enter the ball-room with her dress completely fresh and unrumpled. Only those who knew Madame Leclerc at that time, can form any idea of the impression she produced on entering my mother's drawingroom. The head-dress consisted of bandelettes of a very soft fine kind of fur, of a tiger pattern. These bandelettes were surmounted by bunches of grapes in gold; but the hair was not dressed so high as it is now worn. She was a faithful copy of a bacchante, such as are seen in antique statues or cameos; and in truth the form of Madame Leclerc's head, and the classic regularity of her features, emboldened her to attempt an imitation which would have been hazardous in most women. Her robe, of exquisitely fine India muslin, had a deep bordering of gold; the pattern grapes and vine-leaves. With this she wore a tunic of the purest Greek form, with a bordering similar to her dress. which displayed her fine figure to admirable advantage. This tunic was confined on the shoulders by cameos of great value. The sleeves, which were very short, were lightly gathered on small bands, which were also fastened with cameos. Her girdle, which was placed below the bosom, as is seen in the Greek statues, consisted of a gold band, the clasp of which was a superbly cut antique stone. She entered the drawing-room without her gloves, displaying her beautiful white round arms, which were adorned with bracelets formed of gold and cameos. It is impossible to describe the effect absolutely to illumine the room. The perfect harmony in every part of the beautiful whole elicited a buzz of admiration, which was not very complimentary to the other ladies present. The gentlemen all thronged round her, as she advanced towards a seat which my mother had reserved for her; for Paulette was a particular favourite of my mother, who indeed regarded her almost as her own child. The ladies were all much piqued at the beauty and the elegant dress of Mademoiselle Buonaparte, the wife of General Leclerc. They whispered to one another, but loud enough to be heard by Paulette. that such an impudent display of extravagance was exceedingly unbecoming in a woman who had been almost in starvation only three years before. But these expressions of female envy were speedily drowned by the admiration of the other sex. The beauty of Madame de Contades was now entirely eclipsed, and soon after Madame Leclerc's entrance, she found herself abandoned by her circle of admirers; or if any of them approached her, it was only to make some provoking remark complimentary to the charms of Paulette. 'Give me your arm.' said she, to a gentleman near; and the next moment the Diana-like figure of Madame Contades was seen moving across the drawingroom, and advancing towards Madame Leclerc. The latter had withdrawn to my mother's boudoir, because, she said, the heat of the drawing-room and the motion of the dancers made her ill; though I believe the true reason was, that a long sofa in the boudoir afforded her the opportunity of displaying her graceful figure and attitudes to the best advantage. This manœuvre, however, proved unlucky for her. The room was small and brilliantly lighted; and as Madame Leclerc reclined upon the sofa, a stream of light descended full upon her head. Madame de Contades looked at her attentively; and instead of making any of the ill-natured observations which had fallen from the other ladies, she first admired the dress, then the figure, then the face. Returning a second time to the coiffure, she expatiated on its taste and elegance; then suddenly turning to the gentleman on whose arm she was leaning, she exclaimed, 'Ah, mon Dieu! mon Dieu! how unfortunate that such a pretty woman should be deformed! Did you never observe it? What a pity it is!' Had these exclamations been uttered in the drawing-room, it is probable that the sound of the music and the dancing would have drowned Madame de Contades' voice, though she generally spoke in a pretty loud tone: as it was, every word resounded through the little boudoir, and the scarlet which suffused the face of Madame Leclerc was much too deep to improve her beauty. Madame de Contades fixed her eyes of fire on Paulette, as if she would look her through, and the tone of compassion in which she uttered the words, 'What a pity!' sufficiently informed Paulette that her triumph was at an end. All this (which perhaps I have described with rather too much prolixity) took place in the space of little more than a minute; but these details are necessary, to shew the mode in which the attack was managed, and the success with which a woman of ingenuity may avenge her wounded vanity. What is the matter?' inquired some one who stood near Madame de Contades. 'The matter!' said she, 'do you not see the two enormous ears which disfigure each side of her head? I declare if I had such a pair of ears, I * A milliner and a hair-dresser, at that time much in Madame Leclerc to do so. There can be no would have them cut off, and I will advise harm in advising a woman to have her ears cut All eyes were now turned towards Madame Leclerc's head, not as before, to admire it, but to wonder at the deformity with which its beauty was disfigured. The truth is, that nature must have been in one of her most capricious moods, when she placed two such ears on the right and left of a charming face. They were merely pieces of thin white cartilage, almost without any curling; but this cartilage was not enormous, as Madame de Contades said; it was merely ugly, and its ugliness was the more conspicuous on account of the beautiful features with which it was contrasted. A young woman but little accustomed to society is easily embarrassed: this was the case with Madame Leclerc when she read in the faces of her surrounding admirers the effect produced by the remarks of Madame de Contades. The result of this little scene was, that Paulette burst into tears, and, on the plea of indisposition, retired before midnight."

We conclude our remarks on this work by saying, that though we should be shy of receiving it as historical authority without much investigation, and where other evidence came in support of its assertions; yet it is one of the most entertaining of its companions-very dramatic and very animated. Of the translation we must speak in terms of decided censure; it is executed in a careless style, abounding in errors and omissions: to point out a few will be sufficient. Madame Junot observes, " I am proud to say, that the blood which flows in the veins of my son was not spared by their father in the service of his country." "Sous" should be plural-it is so in the French. Again, speaking of the veterans who "proclaimed France the beloved of nations from the Vistula to the Tagus" - in the French it is " l'aînée," eldest, not the beloved. His uncle le chanoine, is translated as his uncle the cannon, instead of prebendary or canon; and this spelling is about on a par with the grammar: for example-" In Corsica the practice of beating children is common in all classes of society. When Napoleon happened to be beat-" instead of beaten. From these instances of carelessness, we proceed to those of omission. We are very ready to admit that Madame Junot's Memoirs would be improved by compression; but, then, an introduction ought to have been prefixed. stating that such liberties had been taken with the text: and, secondly, some judgment ought to have been used. Much is preserved that is not worth its room, while many acute and just remarks are omitted. Speaking of the terrible influence of the revolution on the young people of its time, Madame Junot observes..." We had neither childhood nor youth." This is a striking picture of the time, yet passed over by the translator. The following very characteristic anecdote is also omitted: "Once, in conversation with M. Permon respecting the assembling of the States-General, M. Neckar remarked, 'I did not commit the fault; but I am responsible for it.' Buonaparte made me repeat this phrase three several times. At length, rising hastily from the table, he observed, 'Without doubt, he was responsible; and therefore he ought to have consulted his strength before he accepted the burden.'

These are only brief specimens of the many faults of the translation; and faults of this kind are very injurious both to literature and historical accuracy. The French edition printed here is also full of errors, from the title-page onward.

Important Facts, proving the great Utility and very great Superiority of Captain Jekyll's Patent Portable Vapour Bath, for the Cure of the Cholera Morbus. By John Jekyll, Commander, Royal Navy. London, 1831. Saunders and Otlev.

WE really cannot decide upon the "very great superiority" of Captain Jekyll's apparatus, which appears complex in its machinery, and is certainly very expensive. Vapour-baths may, in certain stages of the cholera, be useful auxiliaries in the treatment, but cannot be termed certain cures. The bath appears, from various testimonials, to have been used with benefit in many disorders, and we therefore recommend the perusal of the pamphlet to the amateurs of such remedial measures.

The Working Man's Companion. The Physician. 1. The Cholera. London, 1832. C. Knight.

THIS is a cheap little volume, that at the present moment may be of immense utility. It does not exhibit an intimate acquaintance with the disease it treats of; but it bears evidence of much practical knowledge of the habits of the middling and lower classes, and the advice given to them, shorn of all that mystifies and alarms, cannot but be perused with benefit. We are sorry that at the period it was written, the practice, now generally adopted in the north, of salt or mustard emetics with immediate blood-letting, or of calomel with the same operation, was not generally known, and the omission of which leaves the chapter on treatment very imperfect. The plain statement of facts, the intelligible manner in which they are communicated, and the excellent advice contained, would make us wish to see this work on every cottager's or working man's

Most of our faculties are liable to error; but none are so self-deceiving as is memory. By what process a young writer imbues his mind with a favourite author, till he fancies the very words and ideas are his own, we cannot explain. The Last of the Sophis is a kind of transmutation of the Giaour. The author has a musical ear; and many a worse beginning has made a good ending. Still, he must remember, that the poet must not act like Wordsworth's child.

"As if his whole vocation Were endless imitation."

The author of the Phantom City has found nothing but rhyme; for he has only versified the Rajah Hurchund, a story by Mr. St. John.

The subject of David is ill chosen: what can ever even approach to the simple yet sublime beauty of the original? There are some passages, however, which indicate a hope for the future, and which we like enough to quote a specimen.

"Pride is the bane of joy and happiness,
And every blessing,—pride was our first sin,
And rooted once, will flourish on for ever;
Pride is the cypress-tree of life,—its home
The rocky cliff, secluded from man's ken
In Alpine solitude; in summer's reign
Its branches, thick and clustering, deprive
The soil they shadow of the sun's mild ray
And genial fosterage; when all others fade,
Mid wintry wind and storm, they still survive
Wrapt in impenetrable gloom."

Almanach auf das Jahr 1832. Carlsruhe. WE usually put the size of the work, the number of pages of which it consists, the author's and publisher's names, and such other par-ticulars as may be useful for readers to know, at the head of our reviews and notices. But in the present instance it is impossible for us to follow our good old custom, even though we last year spoke of the preceding Almanac of Carlsruhe with such precision as to measure its dimensions. This for 1832 is less. It looks so like a small sweetmeat, that a reader might swallow it in a mistake, and neither catch the cholera nor any other harm by it. Truly we do not know but it might, as it appears to us, be good for the season. Be that as it may, it is lithographed by C. F. Müller, of Carlsruhe, and one of the curiosities of literature.

Without parading the volume itself, the above is the outside of its case. The work neverthe-less contains all the best and most usual information of an almanac; such as saints' days, lists of crowned heads, &c. &c. But besides this it has portraits of Louis-Philippe, the king of the French, and Casimir Perier, his minister; of Leopold, king of the Belgians, of Brougham, lord chancellor of England, of Krakuse, (a genuine Major Sturgeon,) and a plan of the city of Warsaw. Now, when we observe that all this information and fine art lies in the compass of a small bean, we shall no longer wonder so much at the idea of an Iliad in a nutshell. Probably, like the Annuals, which also originated in Germany, these pretty publications will be imitated by some London bookseller; and then we shall have fifty others striving to undermine or outstrip the first adventurer. Nobody can call them heavy, for they are a feather weight; and when you have great folks' portraits in little, Hamlet can tell you what they are worth.

On Indigestion and Costiveness; with Hints on the Use of Lavements, &c. By Edward Jukes, Surgeon. 2d edit. London, 1831. Wilson. The use of lavements has laterly superseded the exhibition of medicines among many persons subject to indigestion and costiveness; and Mr. Jukes's little book may be a serviceable companion to those who have adopted this mode of treatment. The syringe recommended is similar to Reid's, and is certainly a very useful instrument. The diagrams which accompany the work are atrocious.

Cases of Insanity; with Medical, Moral, and Philosophical Essays upon them. By M. Allen, M.D. Part I. Vol. I. Swire. THE author is evidently not accustomed to the method of a literary man. The medical, moral, and philosophical remarks are so incoherently strung together, that a perusal of his work leaves no distinct impressions. We certainly think the manifestations afforded in insanity of the diversity of mental functions, will be the only clue to a correct treatment, or knowledge, of such a fearful scourge to humanity. Let Dr. Allen continue to prosecute his inquiries on some definite subject; and, neglecting the unknown and mysterious, more especially planetary influences, produce such a work as his line of thought evidently renders him capable of doing.

LORD BYRON, HIS BIOGRAPHY, &C.

[In giving place to the following correspondence from Capt. Medwin, we beg to be understood as by no means agreeing with many of the sentiments expressed by the writer; but as we know no subject of greater public and literary interest, and as a number of curious facts and anecdotes are for the first time brought forward, we have thought we could not lay before our readers any thing of the kind which would be more generally acceptable. Of several individuals mentioned, and their works, we have already expressed our own opinions, and for others we have the greatest personal regard; we therefore wish these letters to be received as Capt. Medwin's entirely.—Ed. L. G.]

To the Editor, &c.

SIR,—Having been constantly abroad during the last few years, I have but just met with Mr. Moore's Life of Lord Byron, in which he makes no very honourable mention of myselfbut of that hereafter. So, Mr. Editor, after a seven years' gestation, and no little of midwifery, we have another big book upon Lord Byron. Mr. Moore, has made, after all, a fausse couche-brought into the world a heavy, unwieldy incubus, a rickety offspring, ill-connected and clumsily put together that, as far as novelty goes, possesses a feeble interest, and serves to throw little additional light on the character or pursuits of that very singular person. A perfect Atticus, a nice weigher of words and syllables, sensitively fearful of compromising himself or others, desirous of conciliating all parties, of soothing the animosity of the Cerberuses of the press, of deprecating the wrath of irritable contemporaries (of whose names he only tantalises the uninitiated with the initials) Mr. Moore is little fitted for a biographer; much less the biographer of that fearless satirist and rashly communicative companion, who could not conceal one act of his own, or disguise one opinion he entertained of others. One art Mr. Moore possesses in a marvellous degree-the art of neutralising talent. His Life of Sheridan was wittily termed the Death of Sheridan; and even Lord Byron's genius can hardly withstand the fiery ordeal of his slow chemistry—his power of transmuting diamonds into dust. So much has been said and written about Lord Byron, that the very name is as sickening as the cholera; and these Memoirs have completed the nausea. Byron. like the poet in the Symposium, was only great in his moments of inspiration; he was else an ordinary mortal. His conversation was frivolous and obscene; his letters slovenly in the extreme, and teeming with vanity, persistage, and calembourg. His life, according to Mr. Moore, and if we except his devotion to Greece, was marked by few noble or generous actions; and yet we have 1600 quarto pages about one who had renounced his country, who was a libertine in love, and an ingrate in friendship. He was, as he confessed himself, a true disciple of La Rochefoucauld-self-interest, the primum mobile, the main-spring of his actions; his common maxim and constant observation was, that ' Every body hates every body.

In the Conversations of Lord Byron I was merely a reporter or editor; not so Mr. Moore -it was his duty, as an historian, and biographer, and moralist, to have portrayed him as he was; not to have chosen the sunny side alone of his character: he should have made his faults and vices land-marks, that others might not be wrecked on the same shoals and quick-sands.

Among the most blamable of his actions, of which Mr. Moore could not have been ignorant, was his conduct to the mother of Allegra. That flagration of the autograph Memoirs was ported by Shelley, who paid her pension at Florence. He tore from the mother the unfortunate fruit of this amour, and would have willingly made her over to a stranger: he left this lovely child, on quitting Romagna, to the care or carelessness of strangers; and, a thing never heard of before even among Italians, immured an infant in a convent. Her fate might have been foreseen. He desired she should be brought up a Catholic-a strange mode of proving his own religion, or of shew ing his affection for her. He complained at Pisa of the child's temper-she repaid him with her mother's just hate, and could never suffer his caresses. Poor Clara! And yet, when I met her at Pisa, after the child's and Shellev's death, he talked of its being dangerous for them to meet, and ____but she abhorred him too much. In his will he made no provision for her. Francisca, who has been called his Fernarina, who had thrown herself into the Lagune in the fervour of her passion for him, he mercilessly thrust out of the house. The Countess Guiccioli could not fix his inconstant mind; he made her miserable by his low intrigues and infidelities at Pisa, if not at Genoa; and went to Greece principally to shake off a connexion that was become irksome to him. Of Lady Byron I shall not speak. The real cause of their separation is only positively known to two persons, and probably will ever remain a secret, though the abominable calumniating reports that have gone abroad concerning it are all foreign from the truth. According to Lord Byron's own account, it was not Dr. Lushington, but another lawyer (whom he suspected to be the author of the critique in the Edinburgh Review), who, when his separation cause was before the chancellor. made some unwarrantable allusions respecting him. I have seen Byron, more than once, in a whiteness of fury when on this topic, and heard him vow, that if ever he came to England, he would call to account that personage, whose name I shall not mention. His daughter Ada he disinherited.

Byron's words had almost always a double meaning; the smile that played about his mouth was generally out of harmony with the rest of his features—in his most serious moments there was a laughing devil in his eye. He drew his own portrait to the life in Lara. The great object of his panegyric, whom he flattered for twenty years, was made the subject of one of his most virulent and sanglante satires_I speak of Mr. Rogers, and refer to Mr. Barry and Lady B. for the verses. How much he was Mr. Hobhouse's friend, that gentleman and the public know. It was natural, however, that he could not easily forgive that sage critic for advising him not to publish Childe Harold, and endeavouring to persuade him that it had no merit, and afterwards comparing Cain to the worst bombast of Dryden. Quære, whether these opinions proceeded from dulness or envy? Shelley became unpopular. Though, in private, Byron could not refuse his admiration to his talents and virtues (of the first of which he made no small use), he had the meanness, in his preface to Marino Faliero. formally to disown any acquaintance with him; and during the burning of his body on the seashore (my description of which was taken verbatim from Mr. Trelawney, an eye-witness). swam off to his yacht, such was his sensibility! A few more words for Mr. Moore. The con-educated girl, was abandoned by him, and sup-land from Mr. Longman back to Mr. Murray, needs no comment. Mr. Moore cannot deny that the substance of them is incorporated in his work, itself confessedly full of extracts from these very memoirs. In fact they were any thing but captivating, worth absolutely nothing (I am not speaking of what they fetched or might fetch); and would have scarcely filled 200 pages, such as we have a specimen of in the flaming and feverish jour-nal kept at Ravenna. Well might they be committed to the flames, as it was their fate, instead of being quietly inurned, to rise again from their ashes in the shape of five octavos, or two prodigious quartos, phœnix-plumed like one of Mr. Moore's angels-a rara avis, destined, instead of 20004., to produce 60004. Poor Mr. Murray! But John Bull is the most gullable of all animals, and takes for gospel-truth every puff in every newspaper, though glaringly and barefacedly the production of some self-complacent bibliopolist. Mr. Moore's ingenuity in authorship is admirable; and when I consider the difficulty of the task, it is not the seven years' labour, but the accomplishment, that is miraculous. After all, it should have been called Mr. Murray's Life of Lord Byron: his lordship styled it Messrs. Moore's and Murray's Byron. Is it from such materials __from a bookseller, that we are to judge of a great poet—from the Lintott of this age? Where is Lord Byron's journal in Switzerland? where his letters to Mrs. Leigh? His correspondence with Lady Melbourne on the subject of his marriage? With Messrs. Hobhouse, Shelley, D. Kinnaird, Scrope Davis, &c. &c.? but more than all, with his early, his only friend, as he once con-fessed, Lord Clare? Some of his letters to Walter Scott would also have been acceptable. Where are his papers left with Mr. Barry, that Mr. Hobhouse recommended that banker not to give up-(perhaps Mr. Hobhouse has some new illustrations, some dissertations on Lord Byron in embryo of his own)? Why have we not the relation of his voyage to Greece, and correspondence with Mr. Trelawney, who accompanied him, and was at Missolonghi a few hours after his decease? And yet Mr. Moore tells us that only one person to whom he applied refused him information!!! These were the genuine sources from which a life of Lord Byron should have been drawn; not from his communication with his publisher. Nothing can be well more dull than this correspondence, unless it be the paradoxical controversy respecting the classical and romantic schools with Mr. Bowles, or the pages borrowed from Messrs. Dallas and Kennedy.

Lord Byron, though no great dramatist, was an accomplished comedian, and as little dependence is to be placed on them as on some other of his conversations, in the latter of which Mr. Moore does not seem to be aware that Byron was quizzing the good easy doctor. Fletcher's letter, in which he thinks his master a saint for not eating biccaficus on a Friday, shews what Lord Byron's inward sense of devotion was, and how little the valet had pro-fited by the medico-ecclesiastic tracts. One might as well draw an argument in favour of Byron's matrimonial fidelity from a circumstance that occurred at Pisa, his insisting on Fletcher and Tita's (to their infinite horror,) sending for their wives. It is not in these conversations or letters, particularly letters that he knew were to be published, that Byron is to be read, but in his works.

He owned that he had not the faculty of deperson, whom I had the pleasure of knowing, fine piece of charlatanism. The reason of their scribing any thing that he had not seen; he a young, beautiful, interesting, and highly transfer from Mr. Murray to Mr. Longman, might, with a certain latitude (with some exceptions), have almost said, any thing that he | minded of the author in every page. The sub- | had not done. When he rushed into the cabin with the question, " How does a man feel who has just come from the commission of a murder?" he had probably been brooding over some scene like that of the dungeon-visit in the Corsair, and was endeavouring in vain to screw up his imagination to the sticking-place! It may be said, indeed, that all his characters were impersonifications of himself; occasionally overdrawn and overcoloured, it is true, or with the oscuro predominating over the chiaro; yet still bearing in their general outlines some distinguishing likeness to the original. It is from them that the mind of Byron should have been analysed: he might have been thus dissected, nerve from nerve; and such anatomy we looked for from his biographer. If we open Childe Harold, the Corsair, Lara, the Giaour, but, more than all, that Casti production, Don Juan, we are re-

* It is to the Novelle of Casti, not to Pulci, as Lord Byron would have us believe in his translation, expressly enfeebled, that he is indebted for the iske of Beppo, the Vision of Judgment, and Don Juan. The incident of the shoe was suggested by the Calgoni Ricamati, the shipwreck from the Diavelessa, the description of Michael the archangel in the Vision of Judgment from the Caso di Coscienza—as may be seen from the free and hasty translations below. Perhaps in a second paper I may point out some other plagiarisms from Casti, this incus a non incendo. It is to be lamented that, poet, wit, humorist, philosopher, satirist, and moralist, as he was, he should have stained his compositions with such licentouaness, that Mr. Wellesley Pole said he would not trust his children to the care of any one who had read the Novelle. In the Vision of Judgment, stanza xxviii.

There were those spirits lost in realms of space, # It is to the Novelle of Castl. not to Pulci, as Lord

There were those spirits lost in realms of space,
Trembling, and dubious of their way were treading,
Because they yet had no appointed place;

From heaven the rebel Satan, or from Eden,
And all its joys, the first man and first woman,
By reason of that apple now too common." In the Diavelessa we have

At eventide, nor once the ship they wore They made the mouth of Giberaltar's straits, At eventue, nor once the sing may work
They made the mouth of Giberaltar's straits,
The bounds of either continent, where the hoar
And swoln sea, fetter'd ever, foams and beats—
That ocean seems indigmant of a shore,
And oft makes ravage there of all it meets;
And thus to menace their frail craft with wreck,
A sudden squail and heavy drove them back.
In haste the mariners, with terror pale,
Enclose with the dead-lights each port-hole door
To man's destruction—close-recf every sail:
Bolls the swoln surge—winds rave and billows roarFear reigns supreme—there's nothing like a gale
For taming tiger man. On either shore
They wildly gaze, and scarce can draw their breath
For thinking how they shall escape from death.
Comes mounting on the deck, like a wild horse,

cor tunning now they shall escape from death.

Comes mounting on the deck, like a wild horse,
With shock that skill and seamanship defies,
A giant breaker, with the united force
Of lesser breakers howling: the spray flies,
And refluent sweeps the helmsman and, still worse, jects, too, that he chose always bore some relaion to the type of that which was within him. The Lament of Tasso, written when he was yet ulcerated by a forced separation from Ladv Byron, by the fancied or real injustice of his countrymen, is full of his imaginary wrongs as a poet, and of a metaphysical generalisation of that passion that perhaps in early life haunted and possessed him.

The Prophecy of Dante bears a still more striking allusion to his own story; and Beatrice was one of the same creations that he conjures up in the closing stanzas of Childe Harold. His love for Mary Duff at seven years old, and of Mary Chaworth at twelve, is a ridiculous affectation: in the second case his vanity was alone hurt, and her loss could have had no durable effect, have produced no determinate impression on his future life.

That one so sensual should have written so platonically, is another of the strange contradictions and anomalies in this unaccountable being. Dr. Gall, the queryraper, would have drawn strong arguments from Byron's head in favour of his system. Never was philopro-

From the Caizoni Ricamati I shall only give three or four stanzas. It is to be recollected that the heroine is a butch brewer's wife, and that the tate is written in a strain of low humour throughout. The husband and his pot-companions have been discovered in a drinking scene not unworthy of Teniers—and at length—

Night was far spent, when skin-full every smoker Goes vawning, muttering, stuttering, as best able, And reeling home, scarce one can find the knocker; But not so Peter, who (it is no wonder That he was in the wind) knocked loud as thunder.

genitiveness more prominently developed in any cranium; nor would it have been easy to decide which predominated there, his mental or his animal faculties. Byron, when on the subject of women (his favourite one), always dilated on their faithlessness and their indelicacy, and professed his admiration of Turkish gyneces; and yet it is observable, that in all his serious poems he dwells on the purity, the angelic qualities, the celestiality of the sex: I say in his serious poems, because in Don Juan he shewed what he really felt and thought.

[Here we must break off for this week.]

To the Editor of the Literary Gazette.

SIR,-Your notices to correspondents in the last Literary Gazette announce, that the doom of the Lady Chapel of St. Mary Overies, in Southwark, is all but sealed by Gothic numbers. I trust that those Goths who would destroy so ancient a relic, will, ere this, have been foiled in their endeavours.*

It may be interesting to your readers to know, that in the Lady Chapel, which you have noticed, Margaret de la Pole, who lived in the reign of Edward the Fourth, was most probably buried. I am led to this conclusion by a paragraph which I have recently read relative to the church of St. Saviour's, Southwark, which says, " Margaret de la Pole seems to be buried here; for by her will, (made 12th Edward IV. and proved 1473,) she bequeathed her body to be laid in the monastery of St. Saviour's, Bermondsey, in the chapel called the Virgin's Chapel, on the left hand of the altar."

Mary Overy, or, as she was called in after-ages, Saint Mary Overy, or Over the Rie, (query, Ferry?) was, no doubt, the virgin whose chapel is here alluded to. Ancient chroniclers tell us, that she built a house of sisters "in the place where the east part of Saint Mary Overy's church, above the choir, now stands, and where she herself lies buried."

The De la Poles, as is well known, were Earls of Suffolk. The Duke of Suffolk's house, or Southwark Place, was situated in the Borough. That the name of Southwark was derived from Suffolk, does not appear to me improbable. I have also ascertained that Bermondsey was originally designated Bermond's Eve.

I see no good reason why a lady should be neglected in these barbarous times of mutilation and destruction; and I do hope that, should the Lady Chapel be destroyed, the hallowed bones of her, who in rude ages ferried over the river our ancestors, for, perhaps, the smallest coin, will not be either forgotten or neglected.

Should the information I have given be acceptable, I have the means whereby to furnish much curious reading of a similar description, as respects the city of London and the Borough of Southwark. I am, sir, &c. E. K___E. Jan. 31st, 1832.

MR. FARADAY on the new facts added by Dr. J. R. Johnson to the natural history of the genus planaria. + These animals are found in ponds, pools, and streams, upon the leaves of plants, or in the mud, and are allied to the hirudo (leech). They are flat; some are furnished with two distinct eyes; others have a series of dots round the margin of the head, the second meeting for elections according to which are supposed to answer the purpose of the visual organs. The reproductive power of these animals is most extraordinary; if one be cut into halves, the anterior half soon acquires a new tail, and becomes a perfect animal: in like manner the posterior half puts forth a new head at the place of suction, in which eves are produced, and which ultimately renders the animal perfect. If cut into three, four, or even up to ten pieces, all the pieces live, have supplied to them what was wanting, and each becomes a complete animal! If the head of a planaria be split, sometimes the cleft will close, but new eyes will appear in the new matter; at other times the cut edges will heal up, in such a way that the new matter completes in each half the form of a head, with a new eye, &c.; thus two heads are produced. If the division be made still lower, a double-bodied animal is produced in fourteen or fifteen days; - and it is remarkable to observe that the two halves rarely sympathise with each other, but almost always endeavour to go in opposite directions. At times, so great is this apparent aversion, that the double planaria is torn asunder by its own exertions, and becomes two distinct and perfect animals. Mr. Faraday proved and illustrated these facts, and others in connexion with the natural history of the planaria, by the aid of living animals on the table, and large drawings. At the close of his observations, he energetically called upon the members individually to contribute, as much as possible, to the intellectual pleasure of the weekly meetings; — a call which doubtless will not remain unheaded.

In the library were specimens of borings through the strata of London, presented by Mr. Sadler; Wollaston's apparatus for ascertaining refractive power, with Mr. Cooper's improvement; and various other philosophical objects.

LITERARY AND LEARNED. ROYAL SOCIETY.

Ritchie's paper on voltaic electricity was con- undergoing decomposition. With common cluded, and a paper by Sir Charles Bell, on the water, the temperature of the water in contact human voice, was commenced. This being with the positive-pole has been found to rise bition, but that several distinguished members the new statutes, eight gentlemen were balloted for and elected; and four of the members, whose fellowship from non-payment of their contributions had become void, were re-admitted by ballot into the Society, their arrears having been previously paid. The following is an abstract of Dr. Ritchie's communication. Its object is to investigate the laws which regulate the action of an elementary and compound voltaic. In the first division, the law which regulates the voltaic action Professor Ritchie formerly found, from his experiment, to be inversely as the square root of the distance between the plates; and his present researches corroborate this view. He has also shewn that no liquid can be a conductor of voltaic electricity, unless its component parts have a tendency to go to the opposite poles. Hence all simple substances in a liquid state, excepting the metals, must be absolutely nonconductors: and this idea is beautifully confirmed by the experiments of Mr. Kemp, who has shewn that chlorine is a perfect non-conductor, which fact affords a striking confirmation of the simple nature of chlorine. In the second division, the law which connects the voltaic effects with the distances between the plates, is applied to establish a new theory of the compound battery. By a process of reasoning purely mathematical, the law which connects the energy of the battery with the number of plates, is deduced to be, within certain limits, as the square root of the number of plates: thus, for example, a battery of thirty pairs of plates would produce half the effect of a battery consisting of a hundred and twenty pairs. This deduction is verified by examining the quantities of water decomposed, and also by the application of Dr. Ritchie's torsion galvano meter. He shews, that had the diminution of action in an elementary battery been simply as the distance between the plates, the battery could not have existed; and, consequently, any theory which is not founded on the law of conduction, must rest on very imperfect data. When the battery consists of a great number of plates, the increase of power goes on more slowly than the square root of the number of plates; and hence the author remarks, that he coal is substituted for a metallic wire, in a peducting an equal quantity of voltaic electricity. The author has succeeded in making a column of water, conducting voltaic electricity, revolve FEB. 1st. - Mr. Murchison, president, in the round a magnet, carrying along with it the box in which it is contained. When the water is contained in two concentric glass cylinders, strate, that the electro-magnetic effect depends on the quantity of electricity, and has no connexion whatever with the ponderable matter which acts as a conductor. The author finally examines the temperature which takes place in Dr. MATON in the chair. - The Rev. Dr. different parts of a section of water when much higher than that in contact with the negative-pole; whilst the temperature of the intermediate portion rises higher than either. When metallic solutions are substituted for water, the contrary takes place. In some of his experiments with solutions of sulphate of copper, the fluid in contact with the negativepole rose eight or ten degrees higher than that in contact with the positive-pole. These new and interesting facts have been satisfactorily accounted for by the specific heats of the substances separated at the opposite poles. Thus, for example, the specific heats of oxygen and hydrogen being nearly equal, but there being twice as much hydrogen separated at the negative-pole as oxygen at the positive, the temperature of the negative portion of the fluid must be more diminished than that in contact with the positive-pole. The same explanation applies to the case of the metallic solutions. The author remarks, that these facts seem to open an extensive field of inquiry, connected with the specific heats of different substances.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.

MR. HUDSON GURNEY in the chair .- The Rev. S. J. Allen exhibited an ancient brass head of a pouch, or wallet, lately found in Lincolnshire. Mr. Woodward exhibited a drawing of what he considered two steelyard weights, discovered in the neighbourhood of Norwich. Sir Thomas Philips, Bart. communicated a paper relative to the palace of Clarendon Park, in Wiltshire: it was a survey of necessary repairs in the 1st of Edward I. He observed, that all the rooms mentioned were on the ground-floor, and it appeared the building contained only one story; the roof was covered with shingles, or boards; and, as might be expected, the principal dilapidations were described to be in the roof. The Secretary read part of a manuscript of the late Mr. Hamper, on certain pillar-stones in different parts of the country, called Hoar Stones, endeavouring to elucidate the etymology of the name, and the objects for which they were erected, and mentioning the several places where they had been found: it also noticed the custom of the Israelites, and other ancient nations, of erecting stones to commemorate contracts, to mark boundaries, &c. Mr. Hamper, some years since, published a small pamphlet on the subject; and before his death had made considerable collections, with a view to a new edition, which his executors have presented to the Society for preservation and publication in their Archaeologia. A small part only of this manuscript was read, but much valuable information on the subject may be expected from such a source.

PINE ARTS. BRITISH INSTITUTION.

WE have taken a hasty glance at the productions of our native school about to be opened at this noble Institution; and it affords us great pleasure to be able to state, that it is altogether very highly creditable to our fine arts. The works are numerous-five or six hundred-and completely fill the three rooms; and, notwithstanding this abundance, we regret to hear that many deserving performances were of necessity returned to their consequently disappointed authors. Where there is so much to praise, it would be invidious to mention names in this brief notice: suffice it to say, that not only young and rising artists have contributed their promising quota to the Exhiof the Academy have also enriched the collec-

CHOLERA MORBUS.

THE progress of the cholera in the north of England, and in Scotland, affords a useful lesson to the people of those parts of the United Kingdom which have not yet been visited by the disease. When it first appeared, the author of The Physician remarks of Cholera, " As it did not attack many thousands of people at once, the fear of it greatly diminished; and many continued to deny that the true cholera had come to England." It has, however, gradually disseminated itself along the great roads and the canals of the north, and has now broke out in so many places, that the average number of daily deaths exceeds forty persons. Several of the populous collieries in the vicinity of Newcastle have suffered severely from its ravages. Newburn, Hartley, Howden Dock, Walker Township, Wallsend, &c. are among these. The disease has remained more pertinaciously in small places, like Houghton and Hetton, than even in Sunderland. Houghton-le-Spring is, nevertheless, a very extensive parish, comprising several distinct townships. Mr. Kennedy, the surgeon, has, since the breaking out of the disease, been detained in the house of Mr. Wood, director of the works with which almost all the male population of Hetton, and through them their families, are more or less connected. A traveller took the disease to Morpeth, and one or two persons died of it at Durham; but there have been no other cases in either of those towns since. Two cases have recently occurred in Hawick, in which a close chain of connexion and communication seems to have been traced, first, between the first individual and the traveller, who died of the disease in Morpeth; and, secondly, between both the subjects of the Hawick cases. A private communication from Lord Minto to the Central Board of Health confirms this report; and it cannot be too forcibly impressed, that the precautions taken at Hawick to prevent communication have, for the present, arrested the progress of the disease in that quarter. No one has been at the trouble of recording the manner in which the pestilence was brought to Haddington. This town, it is well known, is upon the great road from Newcastle to Edinburgh; and thence it was taken a few miles farther west, to Tranent, a village upon the hill immediately above Prestonpans. Mus-selburgh is on the same road. In the latter place it broke out on the 18th of January, and arrived at Cockenzie and Prestonpans on the 23d. Every precaution was taken to diminish the fatality of the disease, and cauldrons of hot water were kept for the public use in the market-place, Musselburgh, and at the head of Bridge Street, Fisherrow. Precautions were also taken to prevent the arrival of vagrants, or paupers, in Leith and Edinburgh; but notwithstanding these, the disorder broke out in the first-mentioned town on the 26th of the same month, and finally shewed itself in Edinburgh on the 27th, where there were three cases. One of these was a dealer in bones and rags, a man of dissipated habits, living in the West Bow, and who, it is known, had been in Musselburgh within fifty hours of his being taken ill. There was another case at Southfield, near Duddingston, of a woman who had been to Musselburgh, and who was seized soon after her return. The first death at Leith was a dissipated shoemaker, of the name of Baxter, "Creation" followed. Madame Stockhausen who also brought the infection from Musselsang "With verdure clad," exquisitely. Mr. can be put in force, and where all communication with the neighbouring populous town should be prevented.

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

THE GARRICK CLUB.

THIS Club opened on Wednesday, much to the satisfaction of the members; a number of whom dined in the coffee-room, by way of hansel. The grand dinner is fixed for the 15th. His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex in the chair; when it is anticipated there will be a large attendance of the Club. We purpose commencing a series of papers in our next, directed to promote the objects of this Society in so far as they regard the improvement and patronage of the drama.

MUSIC.

DRURY LANE.

THE oratorio, or, as the bills more correctly designate it, the "miscellaneous selection of music," ' at this theatre, on Monday evening, was well attended. The selection, particularly the first part of it, was extremely good. The performance commenced with Handel's Coronation Anthem, "Zadock the priest;" the effect of which was much impaired by the predominance of the instrumental over the vocal part-the accompaniment is so full and striking, that the voices are sure to be overpowered unless they are numerous in proportion to the strength of the band. The bass solo, "Confirma hoc, Deus," well sung by Phillips, is an elegant and highly pleasing composition by the Chevalier Neukomm. Braham was in good voice: we had our old acquaintance, "Luther's Hymn," with our equally old acquaintance, the cadence at the end of it-rising a fourth, and descending in a triplet on the word "soul." The plain swell and shake would be much more appropriate. " Lord, remember David," is not a judiciously chosen song for a young, inexperienced singer like Mr. Templeton; the plainness of the melody, the incessant repetition of the words, and, above all, the dirge-like time in which it is customary to play it, render it a complete vehicle for the display of nervous trepidation. Mr. Templeton succeeded much better afterwards in Arne's beautiful song, "Blow, blow, thou winter wind." Mr. Phillips sang "Honour and arms," from "Sampson," with great spirit and admirable execution. A good selection from Haydn's

• We have received some observations on preventing the increase of the cholora, from Mr. Baring Gould, of Devon, which do not present sufficient novelty to be admitted into our pages. The author divides his communication into seven propositions: the first relates to the seclusion of patients, which forms part of the recommendation of every board of health, and is, revertheless, seldom attended to; the second is to diminish the number of immates in the house; the third relates to the purification of houses where the disease has existed, and contains a receipt for making cere-cloth with resin and contains a receipt for making cere-cloth with resin and contains a receipt for making cere-cloth with resin and the set of the promise of the fourth conforces rules for cleanliness; the fifth points out the formation of temperance societies; the sixth relates to warm clothing; and the seventh very properly lays stress on the advantages to be derived from that internal peace of mind which is obtained by just conduct and religious feeling.

burgh. The cholera has, it appears, also broke E. Seguin's voice is of a charming quality_at out at Kirkintilloch, a town on the canal, once sweet, rich, and powerful, and, what is about seven miles from Glasgow, where it has better still, well-disciplined, it gave full effect been peculiarly fatal. All the cases that have to the recitative, "And God said," and sir, occurred can be distinctly traced, from one to another, to the house in which the disease at ham sang, "In native worth," and "In splenfirst appeared. This is one of those peculiar dour bright," with his accustomed feeling and circumstances in which internal quarantine energy. The treble solo part of "The marvellous work" was marvellously out of tune; the marvel consisted not in its being so ill sung, for it is extremely difficult, but in its being so patiently endured. Harper's Brass Band performed, for the first time in public. They played, with delicacy and precision, the beautiful march from "Zauberflote," an air from Auber's "Fra Diavolo," and the prayer from Rossini's "Mosé in Egitto." The high notes are remarkably sweet; and the effect is altogether excellent, except a little harshness in the forte parts. The air from " Fra Diavolo" was encored. The second part of the evening's entertainment commenced with a new overture by Spohr; it is spirited and excellent. Madame Stockhausen sang the scena from "Der Freischütz," with German words, with much sweetness and feeling; but we should have liked the slow movement much better without the cadence at the end of it. Neukomm's new national song, "Hurrah! for merry England," sung with admirable spirit by Braham, was encored: it is a good idea to repeat the burden of it in chorus at the end of each verse. The music is good, especially the part which is repeated in chorus. "The sea, the sea," a beautiful song by the same composer, delightfully sung by Phillips, was boisterously encored. Madame Stockhausen, on being encored in a Swiss air, sang another; whereupon the audience were half-inclined to call for that again also. The beautiful finale to the first act of "Tancredi" was well performed. Mrs. H. R. Bishop, who sang the first part, succeeds much better in Italian music than when singing English words. Auber's overture to "Le Dieu et la Bayadère" is extremely lively and spirited, and was very well played. Braham always makes the "Bay of Biscay" worth hearing: the fine discrimination both of his singing and action renders the delusion perfect; and we wonder, when it has ceased, to find ourselves on terra firma. Our limits do not allow us to mention all that was worthy of notice-and no wonder, when a single night's performance contains enough to make two or three entertainments for reasonable people.

DRAMA. KING'S THEATRE.

On Thursday the King's Theatre was lighted up, and its novelties of decoration, arrangement, &c. shewn to a number of amateurs invited for the occasion. The house looks fresh and handsome; and a magnificent chandelier and drop-scene add greatly to its effect. Some fine scenery was also exhibited. The accommodations in the lobbies and waiting-rooms are much improved; but we hardly think the colour chosen (Adelaide green, as it is called) will be very favourable to the complexions of the fair. This, however, will be tried more certainly tonight, when the Opera season commences.

UNREHEARSED STAGE EFFECTS.

[Mr. Editor,—Allow me to preface my present series by declaring unto you, how that certain contemporaries have taken and been taken by my former numbers. The Brighton Gazette has inserted two of the anecdotes, one only of which it acknowledges. The Punchinche has appropriated and altered three of them; the Gentleman's Magnzine of Fashion has dealt similarly by three; and the World of Fashion the same by three more. As none of these worthles have selected the same anecdote, you see, sir, that we have been "pretty considerably" poached upon. The New Monthly has an article avowedly suggested by ours, which they flatteringly call "some pleasant papers."]

Covent Garden .- An effect I had long anticipated has at length occurred. One night last week, Herr Cline, in the midst of one of his elaborate antics, tumbled off his rope on to the stage. He, however, soon recovered his enviable elevation, with the agility of a squirrel.

New Strand Theatre, Jan. 26 .- (First night.) Struggles at Starting concludes with the exhibition of a transparency representing an un-likeness of William the Fourth, with the motto, " Reform it altogether." In Mystification, a Mr. Parker, as a jealous, furious Spanish Don, made so fierce an exit through two foldingdoors in the back of a scene, that he fairly knocked them both off their hinges. The audience only laughed at this, but anon roared at the sight of the once more displayed transparency, with the advice staring the violent jealous gentleman in the face to "reform it altogether!" I have just read the fourth edition of Macnish's Anatomy of Drunkenness; but in the part that treats of the various effects of this failing, I do not remember seeing any mention of the one represented by Mr. Dodd when enacting drunkenness to the life. He not only lost his hair, but lost it en masse; while, to complete the strangeness of the phenomenon, a fresh crop of a totally different colour immediately appeared in the place of the fugitive scalp! I, moreover, always read the published lists of new inventions and new patents; but among the former, though so richly deserving the latter, I have yet seen no mention of a door fixed at the side that bears the handle, bolts, and latch, and opening at the hinges! yet such a door did I, and all as-sembled, observe in frequent action in a cottage-scene, on the Thursday afore-named. The curtain, which opens and closes à la Vestris, was sadly refractory, stubbornly refusing to vanish when we were anxious to see what was behind it; and when we were not wishing for it nor dreaming of it, slipping its moorings and rushing impetuously together. It meets, moreover, with such force that it invariably opens again, just soon and far enough to betray the scampering off the stage of fixed groups or fainted ladies.

Cobourg, Jan. 30 .- First night of the Dreadful Secret. Mr. Gray, when about to reveal the same to Mr. Searle, thus enjoined him,-"Come this way, for it must be uttered where no ear can see, or eye can listen to us!"

• _ • The Lady's Museum, I see, thinks the Robert le Diable at this theatre la chose véritable. There is not a shade of resemblance between the English play and Scribe's.

VARIETIES.

Italian Annuals.—This species of publication has, it is stated, not only found its way into Italy, but is very prevalent in the principal cities of that country. Many popular names appear among the contributors.

Mr. Sinclair in America.—From American papers, before us, we are gratified to observe, that Sinclair has been delighting the audiences of New York, and singing to crowded houses. His Massaniello has been a great hit.

We have had a brilliant winter, and are preparing for a very gay Carnival. The grand characters of his novels are to pass before him in their proper costumes.—Naples, Jan. 17.

Dumas and Milton.—In the compliments paid by M. Dumas to the various actors who contributed to the success of Henri III, he compares Mdlle. Despréaux's conception of the character of the page Arthur to the angels of Milton and of Thomas Moore. We all remember Milton's Raphael ...

"What glorious shape Comes this way moving? seems another morn Risen on mid noon.'

Or his Uriel-

"A glorious angel stands, The same whom John saw also in the sun: Of beaming sunny rays a golden tiar Circled his head; nor less his locks behind Illustrious on his shoulders, fledged with wings, Lay waving round: on some great charge employed He seemed, or fixed in cogliation deep."

M. Dumas' personification of these glorious beings is a pretty French actress, or even our Miss Taylor drest as a page!

Insult to Novel-Writers. — One of the most unhappy cases of ill-placed affection, which makes an affair of the heart an affair of the police, was lately brought before the sitting magistrate of Bow Street. A young lady, interesting-looking, as all young ladies are who get into the papers, (a paragraph is your genuine beautifier, the real kalydor,) forms an unhappy, or, as she expresses it, a virtuous attachment to a young man, whom she is daily in the habit of seeing ride past her window. The youth candidly confesses that he does not know what there is in him so very attractive, and fears that the result of his fascinations will be the loss of his place, he being a gentleman's valet. The fair innamorata persists in pleading for permission only just to see him; - and all this folly, to say nothing of her asking him to tea, seems quite intelligible to the magistrate, through the following question put by Mr. Halls to the prisoner: _ " Pray, madam, have you ever written a novel?" To write a novel being enough, in his eyes, to account for all sorts of extravagances.

Fall of a Meteoric Stone. - On the 9th of September last, about three or four o'clock in the afternoon, a meteoric stone, 64 pounds in weight, fell in the sight of two persons, who soon afterwards picked it up, and found it to be warm and emitting a smell of smoke. The name of the village where it fell was Wessely, in the circle of Hradisch, in Moravia. The sky was very serene, after a high wind and subsequent calm, with the phenomena usual on such appearances, namely, claps of thunder and a hissing noise in the air. The bailiff of the circle immediately sent this remarkable production to the president of Moravia and Silesia, by whom it was transmitted to Vienna. His majesty the emperor, on being informed of the circumstance, desired to see the stone, and ordered it to be preserved in the imperial cabinet of minerals, which contains thirty-five of these enigmatical natural productions, which have fallen at different times in Europe and other parts of the globe. It contains also several that have fallen in various provinces of Austria: __ At Tabor, in 1753; at Lissa, in Bohemia, in 1808; at Stannern, Moravia, in 1808; and the iron masses of Agram, in Croatia, in 1751, &c. &c. After an examination made here, and a comparison of this stone with others of the same kind, from various countries, it has in general the properties of erolites. It give in honour of Sir Walter Scott. All the many more white, like tin, having a metallic lustre, (magnetic pyrites,) and it is entirely covered with a brownish-black crust, resembling metallic dross, having on the surface impressions, some shallow, some deeper, like the marks of a finger in a doughy mass. The form of the stone resembles an irregular four-sided oblique pyramid, much defaced on the surfaces and edges by the above-mentioned impressions. The specific gravity of the stone is 3.680, whence it may be inferred that it contains a considerable quantity of iron.

Metallurgy. - It is said that a Russian colonel has discovered a means of extracting ores by wood fires, instead of charcoal, which would be a prodigious saving of expense. We have heard of other great improvements in the art of smelting, which are likely to be speedily introduced.

Epigram.—The following epigram, upon the recent Scottish Literary Dinner, may amuse those who happen to be acquainted with the respective altitudes of our fairy friend Crofton Croker, and the lofty bearing of our friends Allan Cunningham and Galt:

"All London was present, as I am a sinner,"
Said Hogg to some friends, when describing the dinner.
Crofty Croker, for repartee seldom at fault,
Exclaimed, "I saw Cunningham only, and Galt."

"Licensed to carry Four."
"Why, shiver me!" roars Jack, "what law
Is this for rating craft? A coach may only carry four, But stages fore and oft!"

LITERARY NOVELTIES.

[Literary Gazette Weekly Advertisement, No. V. Feb. 4, 1832.] Mr. Payne, author of the Exposition of Jacotot's Method, is preparing an improved edition of that work; and also a volume of Elementary Exercises on the Inflections, &c. of the Latin Language, adapted to the Epitome Historiae Sacrae. By Mr. Thurgar, a Treatise on the Genders of French Nouns, with copious illustrations from the best French writers.

We are happy to announce that Mr. Sotheby is preparing for the press his expected translation of the Odyssey; and also a new and corrected edition of the Iliad.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Of Eugene Aram, again, in our next.

So large an accession of MSS, and pamphlets has been added to our mass on the subject of anatomy, that we have been induced to postpone our paper once more. The first No. of the new Theological Library, published by Messrs. Rivingtons, was accidentally mislaid. We will immediately pay attention to so sound and sterling a work.

ERRATUM.—In our last, under the head "Society of Antiquaries," the communication from Manchester was by Mr. Whatton suveron from the records of (hebria). subject of expectation is a splendid masked resembling sand-stone, which contains many hall, which the Austrian ambassador intends to metallic grains of an iron-grey colour, and phry Chetham.

CRITICAL NOTICES.

"This work derives great value from the high authority of Mr. Lodge. The plan is excellent, and the work britch out to the last creation of peers."—Literary Gazette.
"A work which corrects all errors of former works. It is the production of a herialce what almost useful publication."—Times.
"Mr. Lodge's Feerage must superseds all other works of the kind for two reasons—first, it is on a better plan; and, second, it is better executed. We can safely pronounce this to be the readiest, the most useful, and exactest of modern works on the subject."—Spectator.
"Of all the improvements hitherted adopted, that which Mr. Lodge has introduced in his new Peerage is undonlitedly the most important. By separating the changing from the permanent records of nohle families,—in other words, the living from the divest,—he has as compished what by any other means appeared impossible;—the giving in a single volume, and at one half the usual cost, a complete account of the present nobility and their families,—in their words, the living from the divest,—he has as compished what by any other means appeared impossible;—the giving in a single volume, and at one half the usual cost, a complete account of the present nobility and their families, which is together than the present of the -Standard.

"This work should form a portion of every English gentleman's library. At all times the information which it contains, derived from official sources, exclusively at the command of the author, is of importance to most classes of the community: to the antiquity it must be invaluable—for implicit reliance may be placed on its contents."—Globs.

"We can most conscientionally report upon the accuracy that it displayed in the composition of these volumes. In matter they are valuable to commoners of all degrees, as well as to the aristocracy; and in appearance they are fit to be placed on the most costly table, even within the chambers of the places triedf. They look like what they are—records of the nobles of the land."—Attas.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

The Records of a Good Man's Life. By the Rev. C. B. Tayler, M.A., author of "May You Like It," &c. 2 vols. 12mo. London, 1832. Smith, Elder, and Co.

THE Edinburgh Review draws the following picture of our present time. "The sum of man's misery is even this-that he feel himself crushed under the Juggernaut wheels, and know that Juggernaut is no divinity, but a dead mechanical idol. Now this is specially the misery which has fallen on man in our era. Belief, faith, has well nigh vanished from the world. The youth, on awakening in this wondrous universe, no longer finds a competent theory of its wonders. Time was when, if he asked himself, what is man? what are the duties of man? the answer stood ready written for him. But now the ancient groundwork ' plan of the all' belies itself when brought into contact with reality. Mother church has, to the most, become a superannuated stepmother, whose lessons go disregarded, or are spurned at and scornfully gainsayed. For young valour and thirst of action, no ideal chivalry invites to heroism, prescribes what is heroic: the old ideal of manhood has grown obsolete. The thinker must, in all senses, wander homeless, too often aimless, looking up to a heaven which is dead for him, round to an earth which is deaf." Such is the profession of faith - " if faith it may be called which faith had none"delivered from one of the principal literar oracles of our time; but its own contrast with the past, and its consequences to the present, are best given in its own words. "Action, in those old days, was easy, was voluntary, for the divine worth of human things lay acknowledged; speculation was wholesome, for it ranged itself as the handmaiden of action; what could not so range itself, died out its natural death by neglect. Loyalty still hallowed obedience, and made rule noble; there was still something to be loyal to: the godlike stood embodied under many a symbol in men's interests and business: the finite shadowed forth the Infinite; eternity looked through time. The life of man was encompassed and overcanopied by a glory of Heaven, even as his dwelling-place by the azure vault. How changed in these new days! Truly may it be said, the Divinity has withdrawn from the earth. Not godhood, but an iron ignoble circle of necessity embraces all things. Heroic action is paralysed; for what of worth now remains unquestionable?" such, even by one who doubts, is admitted to be the consequence of doubt. Well might the Saviour of mankind say, "by their fruits shall ye know them." And this growth of infidelity, planted of vanity and nurtured of vain repinings __ this upas-tree of the head __ what are its fruits but death - what is its shadow but desolation to those who dwell beneath? Is there that man living who can say, " I am the better or the happier for this assertion of my self-suf-ficiency, at the expense of my support?" Re-tion of his own, is wrought in, "like a thread ligion, loyalty, chivalry, fame, could we dis-lof gold," through all that he writes, we should lof Martha Firman, with which we have been

is not in our power, for it is not in our nature, to cast them utterly from us. While a human soul and a human heart are left us, we must admit our weakness, and its admission will raise a cry from the stormy waves of our life—"Lord, save us, or we perish!" Still, we must look up to an earthly superiority, and with a reverence inseparable from that power which is order; still, we must have a higher ideal for action than its common-place necessities; still, we shall desire the approbation of our kind, and feel that the memory we leave behind is pre-cious in our sight. Religion, loyalty, chivalry, and fame-let their spirit depart from our clay, and we are indeed as the dust under our feet. But the eloquent remorse of the passage we have quoted is yet but the voice of the few, not the belief of the many. Still there are millions in the land who have not bowed the knee to this Baal of scepticism; to whom duty, order, belief, and hope, are yet divine. Amid the feverish, hollow, violent, and theoretic pages now falling like leaves in a storm, our attention has been particularly arrested by the work before us. It is the history of a truly religious man, one so beautifully described in the verse cited from Malachi: "The law of truth was in his mouth, and iniquity was not found in his lips; he walked with God in peace and equity, and did turn many away from iniquity." It is the history of a life spent in the offices of peace and of piety, in quiet and in seclusion, benefiting all within its influence, and blessed in itself. Brought into contrast with the previous picture of existence which we have quoted, the effect somewhat resembled passing suddenly from some squalid street in London, dimly seen in the cold gray light of morning, a few spectral figures gliding stealthily around, with shame and crime legibly imprinted on every boweddown head and low footstep; the atmosphere, confined between the near and smoky roofs, oppressing the breath, and the outward dirt of the houses telling of the poverty within. Pass suddenly from this wretchedness of St. Giles's to the fresh face of the open country; the glad sunshine is breaking forth cheerfully, the green fields are glittering with dew, the boughs of the old trees are stirring with the wind, the windows of the cottages are bright with the daybreak, the lark is up and singing, and the air is fragrant with opening flowers. Would not the mere instinct of our nature feel delight, and, while it pitied and loathed the one scene, would it not rejoice in the health and cheerfulness of the other? And such is the contrast between our existence as drawn in the passage we have quoted, and as drawn in these pages: in the one as consumed by vain doubts and vainer despair, and in the other as passed in active benevolence and quiet content, whose reward and stimulus was piety. Next to this pense with their stirring and inherent impulses, | mark, as the great characteristic of Mr. Tayler's what would it advantage us? Fortunately, it style, his exquisite perception of the beautifulthat pure and fine taste to which a bright day is inspiration - which is richly imbued with the poetry dwelling in leaf and flower, and which finds matter of deep delight and thankfulness in that loveliness which only a pious and contented spirit discovers in nature. hero of these pages is a clergyman, who has pursued his holy vocation from inclination, and who endeavours to make his life one constant fulfilment of the sacred vow made in his name at his baptism, and confirmed by the will and judgment of his riper years. The narrative parts are written with that simple earnestness, that air of truth and life, which made the great charm of Mr. Tayler's previous composi-tions—where imagination brings out, but does not destroy, reality. We shall extract one or two favourite passages; but this is a work which must be read throughout. We must apply Wordsworth's lines to this delineation of a humble Christian:

"And you must love him, ere to you He will seem worthy of your love."

"True and false Light. - There are many false lights in the world. There is but one 'Tis our nature to be drawn forth true light. and dazzled by those false lights, by worldly ambition, carnal pleasure, uncertain riches. We seek the sparkling but fatal deceit, we encircle it, hover nearer and nearer. Warnings there are to stop us in our deluded course. A kind hand would often stop us, often it is thrust between us and the scorching glare, too often with too many in vain. They reach the object of their desire, but it becomes their destruction. The true light, the source of life, and cheerfulness, and peace, has shined in vain for them; has been shunned as if it were some horrible and peatilential meteor. Would you see the parable of this in nature's volume? See the moth drawn forth by the glare of a mean and rank-smelling candle. Its red and glowing flame proves only too attractive; the insect hovers nearer and nearer, and the hand of the observer is often thrust before the treacherous light: how very often is the warning offered in vain, the flame is reached, but with it death. For the same insect, the bright and glorious sun, the source of health and life, has shined in vain; the moth has shunned it; we seldom see it on the wing till the bright and beautiful sun has come to its setting."

"Walking in the country on an autumnal day is like conversing with a friend whom we are about to lose, whose death we know to be near. Every falling leaf is like the last words of those who will soon speak to us no more.'

"The man who deems sorrow for past sin. without a newness of life following, to be repentance, is like one who takes medicine for a disease without caring to be restored to new health by it."

"There may be a cloud without a rainbow, but there cannot be a rainbow without a cloud." We regret we have not room for the story exceedingly pleased. Some of the tales in the second volume are old friends-some come with novel attractions - and among these, Anne of Cleves deserves peculiar mention. It was not easy to make a heroine out of the unattractive German, and yet that Mr. Taylor has succeeded in making Anne of Cleves a most interesting one, none who read the present story will, we think, deny. We have only room for its opening scene.

" 'Your highness must be tired of this long sitting,' said the painter, laying down his pallet and brushes, and making a low obeisance to the Lady Anne; 'but never,' he continued, 'have I found a lady so patient and considerate as yourself under the wearisome restraint which painters must impose.' 'In truth, good master Holbein,' replied the lady, with a good-hu-moured smile, 'the restraint is rather a pleasant entertainment to me. You have been in many countries, and have a blunt but lively manner of describing the ways of foreign courts. I will not conceal from you, that I am half angry to find you finishing that portrait so speedily; I would fain have heard somewhat more of the stately court of London, of the king, and the nobles there. However, our pleasant parleys are over, and you no doubt will be many leagues on your journey to the court of Henry of England before this hour to-morrow .- Come forward, ladies,' said the princess, addressing herself to several of her attendants. pass your opinion on the picture before I see it. Fear not to discompose good master Holbein: he is too perfect in his art to mind a woman's censure; and, having finished his work, no remark of ours would prompt his humour or his pencil to desire or effect a change.' A young and simpering dame came forward first, mincing in her steps, and tossing back her head, and looked upon the portrait with half-closed eyes, and then she vowed and wished there was but half the truth in the tongues of other men, as in the pencil of good master Holbein; and then she wondered to herself to find so fair and so exact a counterpart of her most fair and gracious mistress: and then another and another came, and all agreed that the portrait was wondrous like. Some were mere flatterers; and some, from simple love to their kind mistress, were pleased to find so bright a picture of a face they loved. ' I differ from you all,' said the Princess Anne. who had now risen from her chair, and stood before the picture. ' I tell you honestly, master Holbein, that you may be a wondrous fine limner, and a man of genius in your art, but with your pencil you are a mere courtier. I had hoped, from your bluff downright speech, that von were made of better stuff; but you are like the rest about king's houses, a most egregious flatterer. Look you here. See what a fair and comely damsel! Nature must set to work afresh to make this ill-favoured face and form of mine like you bright limning. I have been used to a very different portraiture when I have looked upon myself. Stand beside me, opposite this mirror,' said the lady, motioning the painter to one of the large pier glasses which adorned the walls of the saloon. 'Here, master Holbein, here is the true picture, and here I look in vain for the soft and rose-like bloom of yonder cheek; nor could I bite my lips to such a dainty red as you have given me; methinks those eyes in shape and lustre are very different from mine: in short, I am plain and awkward, and built by nature like a serving wench, while you have made me fair and delicate enough for what I may perchance be Pennant had accumulated the facts transmitted sents a similar numerical proportion. The destined to become, a monarch's queen.' 'No by the fur companies, or gathered together by interesting family of the Sylviada does not art of man, my Lady Anne of Cleves,' replied the painter, half out of humour with her downright and plain-spoken honesty, 'no art of man could ever match with the poorest specimen of that great master-hand, who not only moulded the human frame into such excellent proportion, but breathed the spirit of god-like life and animation into here he suddenly broke off his speech, feeling, perhaps, that he was both by nature and by habit too unskilled to maintain any argument by the mere trickery of glozing and specious words; besides, he could not choose but feel in his heart a slight conviction that the Ladv Anne was right, and that he had rather obeyed the Lord Cromwell's commands than the promptings of his own eye and hand.

Therefore he bluntly stopped his ears to the words which were visibly trembling on the lips of the lady; and ere she could give them utterance, he said; 'By the permission of your highness I take my leave forthwith, to seek an audience of the duke, your father, and then will on to England with all reasonable speed.' 'Go, if you please, good master,' replied the lady; 'but take this as my parting charge and counsel. If you bear that fresh and graceful limning to the English Henry, go with it yourself, and tell him with an honest tongue, that she who sat for it is but a homely

A portrait of Mr. Tayler is affixed to these volumes; it will be valuable to his friends, and attractive to his general readers. It is impossible not to take a personal interest in one whose writings overflow with so much piety, such sincerity, and such earnest and simple kindliness of heart. We do believe this work is calculated to do much good; - we doubt whether we could give it praise more gratifying to the author.

Fauna Boreali-Americana; or, the Zoology of the Northern Parts of British America, &c. Part Second. The Birds by W. Swainson, Esq. and John Richardson, M.D. 4to. pp. 523. Plates and wood-cuts. London, 1832. Murray.

WELL-established facts leave no room for repetition. In the various branches of natural science, the chances of a work being complete are greater the higher we ascend in the scale of organisation; the species are less numerous, more attainable, more distinct, and, need we add? as resulting from the same increased complexity of structure, more interesting in their various forms, habits, and instincts. The adventurous journeys of those who first penetrated the wilds of North America have often excited our sympathy; but those which with undeviating perseverance were continued, despite of all natural obstacles by land and by sea, in the prosecution of a noble purpose, full of hairbreadth escapes, and painful with the hardships and sufferings of our bold and skilful countrymen, have yet left behind them a more valuable claim to our gratitude, and a more certain assurance of immortality, than the me-mory of courage and devotion in the contributions made to science, and the facts that have added to our knowledge of the earth's surface. In the department of zoology, the first part of the North American Fauna, with its graphic illustrations by Landseer, will always remain a source of national pride. In ornithology, previous to these expeditions, little or nothing had been done. Vancouver, Portlock, Meares, and Langdorf, have left no certain information.

Forster, Edwards, and a few others. The results of Kotzebue's voyage are not yet known; and Beechey's researches on the north-west coast remain to be published. But every thing that had been obtained in the several voyages in the Arctic Seas, made by Ross and Parry; the specimens collected during the in-But defatigable researches of Mr. David Douglas, and acquired during the two expeditions of Franklin and Richardson,-the first on the Saskatchewan, at Fort Enterprise, on Great Slave Lake, and at York Factory, and the second at Fort Franklin, Great Bear Lake, and again, in 1827, with the assistance of Mr. Drummond, on the banks of the Saskatchewan; are described in the present work, which, if any thing, surpassing its predecessor in interest and beauty of illustration, will always be a monnment to the indomitable enterprise and intellectual capabilities of those who were engaged in expeditions which enhance the dignity, while they reflect so much credit on the generous ardour for knowledge in the government of that country whence they emanated.

North America presents us with two hundred and sixty-seven birds, of which twentyseven were previously described by Pennant and Vigors as inhabitants of the north-west coast, and probably not above sixty remain to be detected. Few of these birds are resident; the raven, and Canadian and short-billed jays, are the only species recognised as being equally numerous at their breeding places in winter and in summer. Many of the waders breed and rear their offspring during the two short summer months of the Arctic regions. The passenger pigeons do not visit the Fur coun. tries, where they breed, until after they have reared a brood, and quitted the breeding-places in Kentucky. Many other birds also breed in succession in different districts. A large proportion of the migratory birds arrive in the higher latitudes in flocks, but disperse in pairs soon afterwards; and some, as the Emberica nivalis and Lapponica, which winter within the limits of the Fur countries, assemble during that season in large flocks, but separate when they reach their breeding places. Parus atricapillus and Lingria minor live in small families in the winter only; the Tetraenide (partridges and grouse) form coveys of ten or twelve in summer and the middle of winter, but make their spring and autumn movements to and from their breeding places in great assemblages. The Corvus coras congregates only in the pairing season, in the beginning of March, when as many as fifteen or twenty may be seen together for a few days, until each has chosen a mate. Many of the Sturnida, the Columba migratoria, and Pelicanus onocrotalus, fly in dense flocks all the summer. The Hirun. dinide and Laride breed in societies, and hunt for their food in numbers together; but they do not appear to move in concerted flights, like the birds we have last mentioned. The Anatida, again, feed together, but generally make their nests in remote and solitary spots. The vultures, which are three in number, belong to the rocky mountains and Saskatchewan, but visit even the southern states of America. There are fourteen of the eagle tribe, mostly inhabiting the rocky mountains, and all migratory, with the exception of the Falco Islandicus and Accipiter palumbarius. The owls, ten in number, are mostly residents, and some of them beautiful properties are eight in number, and the thrush tribe preand some of them beautiful birds. The shrikes exceed fifteen species; the Ampelida four; the | thereby forming a circle. Fringillida sixteen; the Sturnida eight; the Corvida seven; the Pioida nine; the Certhiads three; the Trechilids two (rare visitants); the Hirundinida six; the Caprimulgide two; the Haloyonide comprises the belted kingfisher, the only one that inhabits North America; the Tetraonide six, with numerous varieties: the Columbide are represented by the migratory or passenger-pigeon alone. This celebrated bird arrives in the Fur countries in the latter end of May, and departs in October -often in numbers that are scarcely credited by those who have not beheld them. Wilson estimates a flock, which continued to fly over his head in an equal stream for the greatest part of a day, to have been a mile in breadth, and two hundred and forty miles in length,comprehending, at three pigeons to a square yard, upwards of two thousand two hundred and thirty millions. The Grallatores afford forty-one species; the Natatores thirty-two; and the Anatida thirty-three. As might have been anticipated, from the character of the country, the waders and swimmers are by far the most numerous in species, though the pigeons must surpass them far in individual numbers, exceeding in that respect the prodigious flights of the sooty pelican which have been observed in the Southern Ocean. Most of the swimming birds winter in Pennsylvania, and migrate in summer to rear their young in the Fur countries. Forty-two species, however, breed in both these, and winter further south; thirty-five winter to the southward, are birds of passage in the parallel of Philadelphia in spring and autumn, and breed in summer in the Fur countries. This is also the case with a large proportion of the waders.

Thirty-four in all of the former have also been detected on the north Georgian Islands and adjoining seas. In the same spots Sir Edward Parry's expedition met with nine waders: and six other families furnished one species each, namely,—the great snowy owl the snow bunting, the raven, an undescribed species of swallow, the American goatsucker, and the beautiful rock grouse. Upwards of sixty-two water birds, numerous waders, several of the hawk tribe, and a few other birds, are common to the Old World and to the Fur countries.

The plates are numbered from the first part of the Fauna, and comprise representations of fifty different species. The character of birds of temperate or cold climates is not great brilliancy of plumage; but this is more than com-pensated by great delicacy of form, and marked development of those parts with which are connected rapidity of flight or strength of wing; in land birds for the pursuit or seizure of prey, and in aquatic for long journeys in boisterous seas, and to endow them with the capability of swift progression in either element. Some of the plates, more especially among the falcon tribe, are noble specimens of art, and preserve, what has been much neglected in natural history, the physiognomical characters of the birds. All of them are coloured; and some, as the Arctic blue bird, are as beautiful and as pleasing in their robes of various hues as any of those tropical gems which enliven dusty museums.

It is well known to our readers, that some of the most eminent zoologists in this country have developed principles of natural arrangements, founded upon the proposition, that every natural series of beings in its progress from a given point, either actually returns, or evinces a tendency to return, again to that point, which is stated to annihilate the system of the creations of nature, and then we may see the illustrious Swede, was first laid down by Mac- proud vagaries and seductive dogmats of speleav with respect to the insect tribe; and the explanation of not only its various details, but inviting but iron frame-work of truth. of the facts to be deduced from them, has been a source of bitter invective between men who should be governed by higher motives for action.

We hold that, however important to this system, the question, whether a genus which seems allied to two different families may be placed in either, according to its external characters, still that, in the first zoological work ever published under the immediate authority of the British government, these considerations were, to say the least, misplaced; though, supposing this not to be the case, we might inquire, if groups are but small circles, within families or classes as larger circles, or, in the language of the school, if circles vary in extent and value, is it not consistent with a system founded on "the method in which the organs and properties of natural beings vary, or on the "theory of representation," in which the contents of a circle or group are symbolically represented by the contents of all other circles in the same class of animals, that all circles should re-enter into one another; just as to ascertain if a group is complete or perfect, we would put each of its divisions to the test of returning into itself, and yet the groups be definite as far as they could be so, in a system possessing so little stability as a circular theory of various numbers.

Mr. Swainson, throwing off the shackles of his predecessors, Macleay and Fries, states that, after eight years of almost unceasing devotion to the investigation, and no inconsiderable portion of two years occupied in revising the groups of the present work, and submitting their contents to many and diversified tests, all the results of his analysis of natural groups tend to shew, that the primary circles of each group are invariably three. And what are these tests? Variety in the organisation of natural beings, identities and analogies in form, structure, or even colour, so numerous, that they can, with the most tantalising ingenuity, be brought to demonstrate, not only that the circle which the one describes is not the circle of another, but that the circular arrangement of any class of the animal kingdom is tertiary, quaternary, or quinary, according to the theoretical opinions of the investigator. "Circles," says Mr. Swalnson, "may be, and have been formed with such a deceitful appearance of following nature, that the most eminent and the most cautious have been led into a belief that they were strictly natural." He further goes on to say, that among groups of a certain value, as genera and sub-families, and it is precisely among these that the theory meets with its practical application,there is not one in three that can be tested by returning into itself; arising partly from our superficial acquaintance with forms, and partly from there being many real gaps in the chain of continuity. It is true, that much research has been shown in the establishment of these groupe with their typical and aberrant mem-bers; as if nature had created a type that should be normal, and two or three that, not even satellites or dependants, should yet fill up that circle as aberrant or anormal creations; though now and then one should be left that naturalists might be puzzled to fill up the gap! Thus research has, we fear, been wasted on a very illusory pursuit; and the time, we hope, is not far distant, when some master mind will revise

This principle, the classifications of men as applied to the culative but erring minds restrained in the less

> Britain's Historical Drams; a Series of National Tragedies. By J. F. Pennie. 8vo. pp. 547. London, 1832. Mannder. WE think Mr. Pennie will best explain his own design. "The following tragedies are intended to form a portion of a national dramatic work; not merely devoted to the purposes of illustrating certain particular events, which stand like lofty and isolated rocks amid the downward rolling stream of British history, but also to display a faithful picture of the manners, customs, and religious observances of those various nations that have successively obtained the possession and dominion of this

> The volume contains four dramas. The first. Arixina, depicts the time of the Roman invasion. The Imperial Pirate also illustrates another period of the same struggle. The Dragon King is during the contest with the Saxons: and Edwin and Elaisa embodies the cruel tragedy, which must be familiar to all readers of English history. Mr. Pennie has entered into his subject with enthusiasm, that great support of industry; and, to say nothing of the talent. the application given to collect material whereon that talent may be exercised, has been unremitting. The notes embody an immense mass of information. Of the dramas, our favourites are The Imperial Pirate and The Dragon King. The following soliloquy will be a specimen of Mr. Pennie's poetical feeling; for the more active scenes, we must refer our readers to the dramas themselves.

"Hail, hour of eve! when fond remembrance flings Her spells of pleasing sadness o'er the soul, Recalling words and forms of those we love, Whom death or distance from our arms hath torn. This is the hour I come to mourn the dead, Where I have raised a monument to him Whose bones lie tombiess on some battle-field, Far from his native land!—Kind Nature shares My hopeless grief.—from the dim forest comes Sad music, like the sound of lonely harps When they forestell the fall of warrior-kings: The river wanders by with plaintive volcs, and the leaf-hidden nightingale laments With passionate feeling, as if she had lost By fowler's mare, like me, her gentle mate! O. that my soul could with you sun-bird mount Where, purpla-clouded, on the world below Gleams a rich glory, like the gate of heaven; There dwell in light and blissfulness with thee, My loved, my lost Ambrosius! Where I have raised a monument to him My loved, my lost Ambrosius

The Druid chorus is very spirited.

" CHORUS OF BARDS: DIRGE. Semi-Chorus.

Semi-Chorus.

 Mightlest of the mighty thou!
Regal pearl-wreaths decked thy brow;
On thy shield the lion shone,
Glowing like the setting sun!
And thy leopard-helmet's frown,
In the day of thy renown,
O'er thy foemen terror spread,
Grimly flashing on thy head.
Master of the flery steed,—
And the chariot in its speed,
As its sithe-wedged wheels of blood
Through the battle's crimson flood,
Onward rushing, put to flight,
E'en the stoutest men of might,—
Age to age shall tell thy fame; Age to age shall tell thy fame;
Thine shall be a deathless name!
Bards shall raise the song for thee
In the halls of chivalry.

Grand Chorus His shall be a noble pyre!
Robes of gold shall feed the fire; Robes of gold small receive the me; Amber, gums, and richest pearl, On his bed of glory hurl: Trophies of his conquering might, Skulls of foes, and banners bright, Shields, and splendid armour, won When the combat-day was done, On his between desthy hile hears. On his blexing death-pile heap, Where the brave in glory sleep!

And the Romans' vaunted pride,
Their engle-god, in blood-streams dyed,
Which, amid the battle's roar,
From their king of ships he tore:
Hurl it, hurl it in the flaure,
And o'er it raise the loud acclaim!
Let the captive and the steed
On his death-pile nobly bleed;
Let his hawks and war-dogs share
His glory as they claimed his care. His glory, as they claimed his care.

Semi-Chorus. Silent is his hall of shields In Rath-col's dim and woody fields, Night-winds round his lone hearth sing The fall of Prythian's warlike king!— Night-winds round his lone nearth sing !—
The fall of Prythian's warlike king !—
Now his home of happy rest
Is in the bright isles of the west;
There, in stately halls of gold,
He, with the mighty chiefs of old,
Quaffs the horn of hydromel
To the harps' melodious swell;
Ahd on hills of living green,
With airy bow of lightning sheen,
Hunts the shadowy deer-herd ficet
In their dim-embowered retreat.
He is free to roam at will O'er sea and sky, o'er heath and hill.
When our father's spirits rush
On the blast and crimson gush
Of the cloud-fire, through the storms,
Like the meteor's brilliant forms,
He shall come to the heroes' shout
In the battle's gory rout;
He shall stand by the stone of death,
When the captive yields his breath;
And in halls of revelry
His dim spirit oft shall be.

Grand Chorus.

Grand Chorus.

Shout, and fill the hirlass horn,
Round the dirge-feast quaff till morn:
Songs and joy sound o'er the heath,
For he died the warrior's death!
Garlands fing upon the fire,
His shall be a noble pyre!
And his tomb befit a king,
Encircled with a regal ring
Which shall to latest time declare
That a princely chief lies there,
Who died to set his country free,
Who fell for British liberty;
His renown the harp shall sing
To mail-clad chief and battle-king,
And fire the mighty warrior's soul
Long as eternal ages roll!"

Grand Chorus.

Now that spectacle is so much the order of the day, what a splendid historical drama might be formed on Mr. Pennie's model! A scenic representation, beginning with the Druids, and brought down to our own time, each scene representing some great event, with the costume and accessories as accurate as possible, what a mass of interest and information might be made to pass over the stage! Such a drama would be an historical monument; and the youthful frequenters of the theatre would learn more of the actions and manners of their ancestors in one evening, than could be acquired in months of close reading. To take two instances that at this moment occur to us,-what a fine scene might be made of Harold swearing fidelity to William the Conqueror on the relics: Normans and Saxons, all that was characteristic of the time, might be brought upon the stage. The other is the vow of the Peacock, taken by Edward III. in honour, and at the instigation, of his queen Philippa, when he declared war against France. What a complete picture might this be made of chivalry and its ordinances! We observe a most respectable list of subscribers to Mr. Pennie's volume. He well deserves encouragement. The work is dedicated to the King.

Journal of a Tour made in the Years 1828-9. our many of the rears robusts. Styria, Carniola, and Italy, whilst accompanying Sir Humphry Davy. By J. J. Tobin, M.D. 12mo. pp. 242. London, 1832. Orr.

A PLEASING little book, and prettily ornamented with engravings. A few selections will recommend it to all who love such light literature and an agreeable fireside volume.

lic. A small theatre is being erected, and is to be finished by the middle of the season, which will be in July. The houses are all arranged for lodgers, and rooms may be had on any scale, from those adapted to the habits of the most simple and retired individual to those of the prince and his suite. The lodgings are dear, but living, on the contrary, is very cheap. An excellent dinner at the table d'hôte, where I usually dine, costs from one to two paper or schein florins (ninepence-halfpenny to twentypence English); but a person may dine at what expense he pleases, as the dinner is always served à la carte, and a good plate of soup costs not more than one penny. A few days after our arrival, I met at the table d'hôte Mr. B., a most agreeable and well-informed man, with whom I enjoyed many a walk in the neighbourhood during his stay, which was unfortu-nately of short duration. Sir Humphry is now engaged in composing a new work, which he intends to call A Vision. This usually occupies our mornings. He dictates to me for an hour or two, then reads over what has been written, which I afterwards copy off fair, and at twelve o'clock he takes a bath. These baths are made with the mother-water, or residue which remains after the greater part of the salt has been orystallised out of the salt water by evaporation, and is an intensely strong solution of chloride of sodium and some other salts. This is diluted according to prescription for the various patients, so many gallons to so much common water. The same solution of salt is also employed for douche and shower-baths, which are much used, and said to be very efficacious. The situation and arrangement of the vapour-baths are rather extraordinary. Above the large boiler in the pan-house, on the scaffolding which supports the roof, and from which the boiler is suspended, a number of small closets are erected, in which the person taking the bath is seated, so that he is not only completely surrounded by the vapour of the boiling salt water, but breathes an air impregnated with many volatile particles. These baths are used twice a-day, and the patient usually remains in his cabinet or walks along the gallery suspended over the pan from one to two hours at a time, which proves in a variety of cases of the greatest utility. Sir Humphry generally dines at three, and afterwards goes out fishing, with his servant, and often does not return till nine o'clock, when I read to "29th. Sir Humphry this morning finished his Vision, which, he tells me, is really founded on a dream that he had some years ago, in which he found himself borne through the firmament from planet to planet.

"We reached the gate of Trieste about four o'clock, and after driving through some fine wide streets wholly paved with flag-stones, and across the Ponterosso, a miserable little bridge, we took up our quarters at the Locanda Grande, in the market-place; but our rooms looked towards the harbour and sea, and immediately beneath them we heard the joyous noise and bustle of the sailors. What a difference between this town and the inland cities of Germany! There all seems dead or asleep, and hardly a living soul is to be seen in the streets; here, on the contrary, all is activity and animation. The representatives of all nations seem assembled here,-Italians, Germans, English, and Americans, with Greeks and Turks in their national dresses, are seen walking through the streets or sitting before the doors of the cafes: this latter applies es-"Ischl has but one church, which is Catho- pecially to the Turks, who, in their graceful to move a finger, till the guide came down costume with their long pipes, attract the notice of every stranger unaccustomed to see individuals of this nation.

" I left Trieste early this morning, with a guide, to visit the grotto. After a three hours' walk over two very long and steep hills, from which, however, the view over the Adriatic, with numberless white sails flitting across its waves, the two coasts, the harbour with its shipping, the town and the gardens surrounding it planted with cypresses and olives, was magnificent, we reached Corneale, a small and dirty village, and having here provided ourselves with a man carrying a large lamp, and some boys with candles, proceeded over some very rough and stony fields to the grotto. The entrance was not, as I had expected, in the side of a hill, but in the open fields, and surrounded by a wall. Having lighted our lamp and candles, I took off my coat, and we began the descent down some very slight wooden stairs, the steps and railing of which were, as I afterwards found to my cost, not only slippery, but quite rotten from the continual dripping. The entrance, or hall, is a fine lofty dark vault, supported in the middle by one enormous stalactite column. Beyond this the cave becomes narrower, and the numberless stalactites of all sizes present a greater variety of forms than it is possible to describe: immense cauliflowers, trunks of trees, fruits; rounds and ovals of all sizes, from that of a marble to globes of many feet in diameter; pyramids rising up from below, and whose bases are lost in profound darkness; myriads of peaks hanging from the roof, often invisible to the eye, are seen at every step. These different forms, the deathlike stillness of the cave, the total darkness, except in those points where the guides placed themselves so as to illuminate the most striking objects; deep precipices before and around me, from out of which here and there a single snow-white column rose, formed, and still forming, by the water which falls in measured time from the unseen roof; the flickering lights of our candles,-all this, and the thought of where I should roll to were I to slip from the frail steps into one of those dark abysses, produced an indescribable feeling of awe and fear. Descending further into the cavern, we passed by the Lion's head, the Melon, the Death's head, and the two magnificent single pillars, the one plain, the other beautifully fluted, both of which, upon being struck by the hand, emit a loud sonorous sound, that thrills mournfully through the surrounding silence. Beyond these we came to the Waterfall, one of the finest specimens of stalactites in the cavern: other pillars and pyramids; and last of all to the Baldachin, or canopy formed of beautifully fluted hanging stalactites. Beyond this point the cave had not been explored, as the preci-pices are very dangerous. Even the descent to this spot is not very safe, being often along very narrow slippery paths and rotten stairs, or rather ladders. On my return I sketched different subjects in the cave, and whilst drawing the entrance-hall, incautiously sat upon the wooden hand-rail, when I heard a sudden crack, and felt that I was falling backwards. Not being able to recover myself, I slipped from rock to rock, turning twice over head and heels, but without injury, and with perfect presence of mind, although I expected every instant to be dashed over the edge of a precipice. As soon as I felt my fall become slower, I stopped myself with my hands, with my head downwards, and my heels in the air. In this position I remained some minutes, not daring through the rocks with his lamp to my assistance; with his help I regained my feet, and found that I had been lying on the very verge of a smooth rock, beneath which was a dark and impenetrable abyss. My next fall would probably have been into eternity. After the whirl of my brain had passed away, I found, with the exception of some light bruises, that I had not injured myself, as the rocks were very smooth and round. Having reascended, we left the cave, and I sat for a long time in the fresh air, as I felt very sick. The guide and the boy had been exceedingly terrified, and still looked as pale as I think I must have done myself; nor shall I soon forget the shriek they uttered when they saw me falling. After a draught of water that was very refreshing, though from a dirty pool in the field, and paying the man and boys who had been in the grotto with me for upwards of two hours, I returned to Trieste, where the tailor and a good dinner set every thing to rights again. Sir Humphry had just received two living torpedos, and made some experiments with them upon the power and effect of their electricity, which he seemed inclined to think of a peculiar

" From Trewalchen we went on to Adelsberg, where we did not arrive till night; and as Sir Humphry said that he should the next morning go on to Zirknitz, I determined to visit the principle grotto in the night. There are two here, the grotto of the Magdalen, long known and celebrated as being the only spot in which the Proteus Anguinus had been found; and the great grotto, only lately discovered, and more remarkable for the variety and grandeur of the stalactite formations which it contains. After having read to Sir Humphry till nearly ten, I set out, accompanied by three guides furnished with lamps and some pounds of candles. We walked across the fields for about a mile in darkness, the moon not having yet risen, till we came to a slight ascent which brought us to a door in the mountain. The guides here lighted their lamps, and cut the candles into bits, and unlocking the door, we entered and found ourselves in a low and dark passage. Two of the guides went on before with the candles, and I followed a few minutes after with the other, the only one of the three who spoke German. The passage brought us to the top of a rock, where we found ourselves in an immense vault, the roof and sides of which could not be distinguished by the eye. Below us, at the foot of the rock, we heard the rushings of a river, whose waters were invisible to us owing to the extreme darkness. We saw the other two guides upon a frail wooden bridge, which is thrown across the subterraneous stream, they having already lighted some of the candles, which they were engaged in fixing upon the side rail, and in a few minutes more than thirty candles in some degree dispelled the darkness which surrounded us. The river became visible for about one hundred yards on each side of the bridge, flowing as it were out of total darkness above, and passing again into gloom and shade below it. The light, however, was by no means suffi-cient to enable me to discover the roof of this vast dome. It is a striking scene, but very different from any presented by the grotto of Corneale, and a poet might have thought the vault a banqueting room for the giants of old, or the council-chamber of Lucifer and his host; the dark and rushing water the gloomy river Styx dividing him from the kingdom of Pluto, and have expected to see the grim ferryman pear to me to be of any very great extent, and wrong room. He told me that Sir Humphry appear with his boat. There was, however, no I felt persuaded, that with the help of a few went to sleep after we had left him, but that

Charon to ferry us over, and we accordingly long poles, it would have been possible to have descended the steps in the rock, and crossed passed over the slippery rocks on its sides; the river by the tottering and slippery bridge. A steep path cut in the rocks on the other side conducted us to the Little Temple, a small vault, whose roof and sides were covered with stalactites of the most varied and grotesque forms, hanging down from the roof, shooting out from the sides, or rising as stalagmited from the floor, some pointed, some round, and others flat, thin, and transparent. In one part of this temple are inscribed the names of the strangers who have visited the grotto. From hence we went to the Hall, or Place of the Tournament, passing in another vault by the Butcher's stall, perhaps one of the most apt denominations of the many which the guides have given to the numerous larger masses of stalactite met with in these caverns. It stands alone, projecting from the walls of the vault, and somewhat resembles a pulpit in form. One of the guides enters this stall with a lamp, and illuminates the different joints of limestone meat, sausages, hams, &c., which hang around. The Tournier Platz, or Place of the Tournament, is a lofty and extensive cavern, the floor of which is formed of very fine sand, and is exceedingly level and firm. The shape of the vault is oval, and the sides have some slight resemblance to an amphitheatre. On Whit-Monday the whole of the grotto is illuminated, and hundreds flock to behold this curious scene. the Tournier Platz being arranged as a ballroom, and in which the visitors dance till a very late hour. From thence we went through long passages and caverns, each of which presents something remarkable. In one, a large pillar rises from the ground, which, on being struck with a stone or stick, gives out a sound resembling the deep and sonorous tone of a tolling bell; and in another stands a large fluted pillar, to which the guides give the strange name of the Kanonen-Saüle zu Moskau, or the Pillar of Canons at Moscau. In another part of the cavern we see a vase, on the top of a small pillar, constantly full of water, which falls into it, drop by drop, from the roof; it is perfectly clear, and icy cold. Beyond this font we came to the great curtain, the most striking single stalactite in the whole cavern. The limestone here descends in many a waving and beautiful fold from the roof, from a height of upwards of twenty feet, and projecting about six feet out from the rock. The whole mass is exceedingly thin, and is bordered by a stripe of red. Seen from a distance, when the guides hold their lamps behind it, the effect is highly striking, and the spectator can hardly believe that the transparent curtain before him is formed of hard stone. The red colour in the edge of this mass of limestone is the only instance of the kind I met with in the grotto, the general colour of the stalactites being either pure white or whitish brown; and they are often covered with a crust of very fine crystals. At some distance beyond the curtain the cave divides into two branches, one of which ends with a large block of limestone, that bears the name of the high altar; the other has been rarely trodden by the foot of a stranger, for my guide said that this was only the second time that he had been there since the discovery of that part of the cave, by him and another of the men who were with me, six or seven years ago. It extends for a considerable way, till all further progress is stopped by a large pool of water, over which the guides said no one had ever crossed. This pool did not ap-passed over the slippery rocks on its sides; we had, however, nothing of the kind with us, and I was obliged to abandon the idea, nor did the guides appear at all inclined to continue our peregrinations, having already penetrated to a greater distance than usual. I carefully examined the water, but in vain, to see if I could discover any thing like a proteus, and I asked the guide if on his former visit he had seen any animal in the pool, but he said he had not. The paths through the cavern are generally very good, and broad enough for two or three persons to walk abreast, and have in many places been widened and levelled by art; but the road from the curtain to the end of the grotto passes over a chaos of rocks and large broken stalactites: these, though now united by the all-binding lime-water into shapeless masses of rock, formerly composed the roof, but have now given place to newer formations; so that even in these subterraneous caverns, as in all other of Nature's works, man beholds destruction only as making way for regeneration. The process is one of the slowest, but sure in its effects: an accident (the shock of an earthquake, for example) may strew the floor of the cavern with the stalactites which hang from the roof, yet the impregnated water flows from above, deposits the limestone, and in a few centuries the roof is again ornamented with its curious and beautiful fretwork. Retracing our steps through the different halls, temples, and passages, we again found our-selves on the banks of the subterraneous river. This is the Laibach, which, rising in the plain above Adelsberg, enters the mountain, and after flowing through the cavern and under ground for a considerable distance, again appears at the foot of the hill near Planina. We crossed the little bridge, ascended the rocks, and, taking a last look around the vast and dark cupola by which we had first entered, I bade adieu to the caverns of Adelsberg. On coming out of the mountain the air felt very cold, for the temperature within had been very agreeable - almost warm. It was past one o'clock, so that we had been three hours under ground. The moon was up, and, guided by her clear light, we soon reached the inn, where I dreamt till morning of grottos, and caverns, and their spirit inhabitants."

Shooting, fishing, and endeavouring to flee from death to the last, that great conqueror overtook Sir Humphry at last, at Geneva.

"29th May. I quitted Sir Humphry yesterday evening, after having read to him, as usual since we left Rome, till about ten o'clock. Our book was Smollett's Humphry Clinker, and little did I think it was the last book he would ever listen to. He seemed in tolerable spirits, but upon going to bed was seized with spasms, which, however, were not violent, and soon ceased. I left him when in bed, and, bidding me good night, he said I should see him better in the morning. Lady Davy and the doctor also quitted him, and George went to bed in his master's room, as he always had done since Sir Humphry's illness at Rome. At six o'clock this morning, Lady Davy's man-servant came to my room, and told me that Sir Humphry Davy was no more. I replied that it was impossible, and that he probably only lay in a torpor; but I went down to his room instantly, when I found that the servant's words were, alas, but too true! I asked George why he had not called me, when he said that he had sent up, but now found that it had been to a he had twice waked; and that at half-past one, hearing him get out of bed, he went to him. when Sir Humphry said he did not want his assistance, and poured some solution of acetate of morphine into a wine-glass of water; but this still remained untouched upon his table. George then helped him into bed, where he says he lay quite still till a little after two o'clock, when, hearing him groan, he went to him, and found that he was senseless and expiring. He instantly called up Lady Davy and the doctor, and sent up, as he believed, to me; but Sir Humphry, he says, never spoke again, and expired without a sigh. I had so often, whilst at Rome, seen Sir Humphry lie for hours together in a state of torpor, and to all appearance dead, that it was difficult for me to persuade myself of the truth; but the delusion at length vanished, and it became too evident that all that remained before me of this great philosopher was merely, the cold and senseless frame with which he had worked. The animating spirit had fled to its oft self-imagined planetary world, there to join the rejoicing souls of the great and good of past ages, soaring from system to system, and with them still to do good in a higher and less bounded sphere, and I knew that it was freed from many a wearisome and painful toil. Yet I could not look upon Sir Humphry as he was, without remembering that which he had been; and my tears would fall, spite of my effort to restrain them."

Origines Liturgica; or, Antiquities of the English Ritual, and a Dissertation on Primitive Liturgies. By the Rev. W. Palmer, M.A. 2 vols. 6vo. Oxford, 1832.

THE want of such a work as this has long been felt by every intelligent clergyman, and by many lay members of the church of England ;- by all, in fact, who are churchmen and Christians in more than the name. All such must wish to know something of the original sources of that admirable form of words, which is, perhaps, as it stands, the most perfect human composition, and which nothing but the habit of constant use and familiarity prevents from being more often noticed and admired. This want appears to be exceedingly well supplied by the work before us; and much credit is due to the author for his diligent and useful research, and the judicious manner in which he has condensed the valuable information he has collected at the expense of some years of laborious investigation.

A few extracts from the preface will better explain the nature and plan of the work.

"Such topics are, in fact, connected with much that is important; for he who is acquainted with the principles and practice of early times will best comprehend the purport of our rites. The English Prayer-book was not composed in a few years, nor by a few men: it has descended to us with the improvements and the approbation of many centuries: and they who truly feel the calm and sublime elevation of our hymns and prayers, participate in the spirit of primitive devotion. The great majority of our formularies are actually translated from Latin and Greek rituals, which have been used for at least fourteen or fifteen hundred years in the Christian church; and there is scarcely a portion of our Prayer-book which cannot in some way be traced to ancient offices. Most of our ritualists have noticed these circumstances; but, with the exception of Nicholls, who printed the originals of many of our collects from the Sacramentary of Gregory, no

the English Offices in their original languages. My own attention was called to this fact when, in the course of preparation for holy orders, it became my duty to study our Ritual: and while I was endeavouring to ascertain the precise meaning of some expressions, I experienced such difficulties in referring to the originals, as induced me to seek some commentary resembling that which the reader has now before him, and subsequently to resolve, as far as was in my power, to supply the deficiency. The propriety of such an undertaking does not, I am happy to say, rest on my opinion alone. The late Bishop of Oxford (Dr. Lloyd), whose authority should have weight on such a subject, was so convinced of its expediency, that he was himself collecting materials for the purpose, which he intended to publish so soon as his avocations should permit. His lordship's collections were entered on the margin of a folio Prayer-book, in the library given by Dr. Allestree for the use of the regius professor of divinity in this university; and having been kindly permitted to compare them with the results of my own investigations, I have derived from them several valuable observations, which are acknowledged in their proper places.

We cannot conclude without noticing the very handsome manner in which the book is got up, and the moderate price which is fixed upon it, both of which are equally creditable to the Oxford University Press, and the delegates appointed to superintend it. The publication of such works of sterling merit is a credit to the university itself. The vignette of the new university printing-house, which appears, we believe for the first time, in the title-page of this work, is exceedingly pretty, and the building is in a style of magnificence worthy of Oxford and of the age.

The Mythology of Ancient Greece and Italy.

For the use of Schools. By Thomas Keightley, author of "Outlines of History," &c. &c.

Pp. 202. Whittaker and Co.

A VERY delightful little volume, and well calculated for its purpose. A knowledge of mythology is absolutely necessary; but most works giving that knowledge are liable to great objections. Now, these pages have been most carefully revised; and the young scholar may here acquire a general and accurate idea of the classical creed, without any of the usual drawbacks. The history of Pandora will be a pleasant specimen of Mr. Keightley's style.

"Jupiter, angry at the theft of fire from heaven, committed by Prometheus for the sake of mankind, resolved to give them a corresponding evil. Hitherto men had lived happy and contented, without any women amo them. All evils were enclosed in a jar which stood in the house occupied by Prometheus (Forethought) and his brother Epimetheus (Afterthought), who were careful never to raise the lid and let them escape. This blissful state, however, was not long to continue. Jupiter, calling Vulcan to him, directed him to take some earth and knead it into a form resembling that of the immortal goddesses, and endow it with speech. Minerva was desired to inspire it with the knowledge of female works; Venus to bestow on it beauty and desire; and Mercury a thieving disposition. When formed and endowed with these gifts of the gods, the new creature was named Pandora (All-gift); and being attired by the Graces, and crowned with flowers by the Seasons, she was led by Mercury to the house of Epimetheus. Though warned by his brother to be on his guard, and to re-could not resist the charms of Pandora. He received her into his house, and made her his wife. The jar soon caught the attention of the bride: she burned with curiosity to know its contents; and raising the lid, instantly evils of every species flew forth, and spread over the Terrified at what she had done, Panearth. dora clapped down the lid, but only in time to prevent the escape of Hope, who thus remained in the abode of men. Such is the more correct account of the manner in which Pandora was the introducer of evil into the world. According to the more usual one, she brought the evils from heaven with her, shut up in a box. But this last supposition has been shewn to be clearly at variance with the original narrative, as it is given by the poet Hesied. It is said, that when Prometheus stole the celestial fire for the use of mankind, they were so ungrateful as to inform Jupiter of the theft. As a reward, the god bestowed on them a remedy against old age. It being summer-time, and the gift a little heavy, they put it on the back of an ass, and let him trot on before them. The ass, being thirsty, went up to a spring to drink; but a snake who was there refused to permit him to approach it unless he gave him the burden which he was carrying. The ass was forced to comply; and thus the cunning snake became possessed of the precious gift of Jupiter: but, by way of punishment, he got with it the thirst of the ass. Hence snakes renew their youth by casting their skins, while men are oppressed with all the evils of eld age: and the malignant snakes, moreover, communicate their thirst to men by biting them whenever they have an opportunity."

The Works of Lord Byren. Vol. II. London, 1832. Murray. WE can give no higher praise to this edition

WE can give no higher praise to this edition than to say that it goes on as it began. The palace of Ali Pasha, and a view of Constantinople, are its very beautiful illustrations.

Standard Novels, No. XII. Canterbury Tales. By Harriet and Sophia Lee. Colburn and Bentley. London, 1832.

An interesting preface, where the surviving author gives an affectionate account of the former partner of her efforts, is affixed to these tales. They well deserve republication; they are full of incident and variety, and the story is always pleasantly told. The illustrations, by Stephanoff, are very graceful; the vignette is our especial favourite.

Aldine Poets. Poems of Milton, Vol. II. W. Pickering. London, 1832.

WE have nothing more to do than to announce the continuation of this beautiful edition. An editor superior to Mr. Mitford could not be found.

cannot in some way be traced to ancient offices.

Most of our ritualists have noticed these circumstances; but, with the exception of Nicholls, thouse so the bouse of Epimetheus. Though warned lects from the Sacramentary of Gregory, no one, I believe, has yet published any part of caive no presents from Jupiter, Epimetheus.

the author's style: perhaps the following is as good as any that can be conveniently detached. Akenside lived for a while at Hampstead.

" Hampstead could not be suited to a man like Akenside. The inhabitants were respectable and rich; but many of them were not only respectable and rich, but purse-proud, and therefore supercilious. They required to be sought; their wives and daughters expected to be escorted and flattered; and their sons to be treated with an air of obligation. It is no difficult task for an elegant man to flatter beautiful women and celebrated men; but to be subservient to those who are already too vain and supercilious, and who assume in proportion as they are flattered and yielded to, is not only beyond the practice, but even beyond the honest patience, of a man enriched by nature and embellished by education. After residing two years and a half at Hampstead, therefore, Akenside returned to London, and took up his abode in Bloomsbury-square, where he continued to live during the remainder of his life."

Mr. Bucke's criticisms on, and quotations from, Akenside's poems, are very interesting.

The Georgian Era. Memoirs of the most eminent Persons who have flourished in Great Britsin from the Accession of George I. to the Demise of George IV. Vol. I. Pp. 582. Vizetelly, Branston, and Co.

WE have not had sufficient time for a detailed examination of this compendious volume (the first of four, of which the work is to consist), so as to be able to speak decidedly upon the merits of the multitude of memoirs which it contains. It does seem, however, to be a production of infinite variety and entertainment. We have here biographical sketches of all the royal race, of the Stuarts and their adherents, of distinguished churchmen and dissenters, and of statesmen belonging to the epoch embraced. A great number of medallion portraits, twelve on a page, embellish the letter-press, and afford traits of the characters; but we cannot say, in general, that the likenesses are striking. Altogether, however, the idea of such a production is excellent, and its execution, so far as we can yet judge, such as to entitle it to the widest popularity.

Nights of the Round Table, or Stories of Aunt Jane and her Friends. By the Author of the "Diversions of Hollycot," "Clan Albin," "Elizabeth de Bruce." First Series. 12mo. pp. 336. Edinburgh, 1832, Oliver and Boyd; London, Simpkin and Marshall.

THIS is a very amusing volume, lively, natural and full of kindly feeling and just observation bating a few faults of language. The first half of the book makes it so far as pleasant a gift as could well be bestowed on our young friends at Christmas: it will both entertain and instruct them. But to the last story we have a most serious objection, as being utterly unfit for the youthful readers to whom it is addressed. It is the history of a clever and unprincipled girl, who plays a bold game in endeavouring to become either wife or mistress to a rich marquess, who on his part makes use of her as an instrument to subdue the spirit of his spoilt daughter, whose attendant she is. We hold that the mind requires to be hardened by experience before it can benefit from the truth which is to be learnt even from the exposure of profligacy or hypocrisy. And the tale is little redeemed by the piece of cant morality about the upper ranks being so much more "heartless, These are two exceedingly pretty works. Mr. Charlton.

arrogant, shallow, and ignorant," than the females of middle ife. Our second fault is the occurrence of most objectionable phrases : what can be in worse taste, in the mouth of a young and elegant woman, than the following sentences? "Oh, shocking, Sophia! you have a broader kiss than John's welcoming one; you slobber as bad as little Dick;" or, "See how the sweet burden hangs so lovingly helpless on the arm of the marquess - that is, of her Jaffler; for to the Marquess of Aulmerle she would not raise her eyes for worlds; while in fit time and place, it is as impudent a little bit of mischief as a man could desire to meet with." Or such mistakes in grammar as this:—" The family was wealthy for the style in which they lived." Still, there is much in the book that we cordially admire. The history of the Spitalfields widow is a beautiful picture of pious and contented humility; and the plan of "the biographical tales" equally original and well executed. We see a second series of these "Nights" promised; we look forward to them with pleasure. We have not pointed out one fault that may not easily be remedied, but many merits that deserve cordial praise.

History of Woburn and its Abbey. By J. D. Parry, M.A. London, 1832, Longman and Co.; Woburn, Dodd; Brighton, Wright. THE interest of a work like the present must necessarily be local; still, a large mass of curious information is so pleasantly collected, that the general reader may dip into this volume and find much entertainment. We quote one or two specimens.

"An. Dom. 1317 .- The harvest was early, so that all the corne was inned before Saint Giles's day, being the first of September: a bushel of wheat, which before was sold for 10s. was then sold for 10 pence, and a bushel of oats, which before was sold for 8 shill., was then sold for 8 pence. An. Dom. 1329. (A Corn Law.)—The third year of Edward the Third, a statute was made prohibiting the importation of wheat, rye, or barley, into this realm, unless the price of wheat exceeded 6 shill. 8 pence the quarter, of rye 4 shill., of barley 3 shill.; at that port or place when the same should be brought in, upon pain of forfeiture thereof."

We conclude with two epitaphs; the first on Jane, wife of Sir Henrie Cheyne.

" Here lies my bodie in corruption's bed,
My soule by faith and hope to Heaven is led;
Imprisoned by life, death set me free,
Then welcome death, step to Æternitie."

The second on Lady Maria Wentworth -

"And here the pretious duste is layde,
Whose puerile tempered clay was made
So fine that it the guest betray'd. Else the soule grew so fast within, It broke the outward shell of sinne, And so was hatched a cherubim. In height it sour'd to God above, In depth it did to knowledge move, And spread in breadth in general love. Before, a pious dutye shin'd To parents: curtesie, behind: On either side an equal mind. Good to the poore, to kindred deare, To servants kinde, to friendshippe cleare, To nothing but herself severe. Soe though a virgin yet a bride, To every grace she justified A chaste poligamie, and dyed."

The volume is ornamented by six illustrative engravings.

The Album Wreath. Nos. I. II. III. IV. London, 1831. Willoughby.

Coloured paper covered with anecdotes, short poems, and various devices, form a pleasant variety for the drawing-room. Of the two, the literary selections are made with most judgment in the Album Wreath, while those in the Drawing-room Scrap-Sheet are generally inferior; but the embellishments have much taste and fancy. The idea is excellent, and might be greatly improved. For example, the original poems might be a little above the pocket-book order, those selected might be better, and care should be taken to mark whence they are extracted. Thus, in the Scrap-Sheet, of No. III. there is a quotation from Langhorne's Owen of Carron, "Hast thou not found?" &c., but no mention whence it is copied; and of the taste which has presided over the choice the following verse is a proof:

"In childhood we bud, and the summer's sun burn Every passion to reason too deaf; But the winter wind's chill will soon make us return, And remember the fall of the leaf."

A larger type would, we think, be a great improvement. The publishers announce their intention of filling up the now vacant spaces with small prints, of which plan specimens will be shewn at their house. We repeat, the idea is good; and we have no doubt the Album Wreath and the Drawing-room Scrap-Sheet will meet with the encouragement they well deserve.

The Sacred Offering. 24mo. pp. 192. London, 1832, Hamilton, Adams, and Co.; Maples, Liverpool.

POETRY sweet and sad, but sweetness strengthened by faith, and asdness mitigated by hope which is "not of this world" -much that is both soothing and touching—form the contents of this graceful little volume. There are two engravings, a Holy Family, and the Raising of the Widow of Nain's Son; and both well executed by C. Rolls. Altogether, this diminutive book well deserves a continuation of the favour which was bestowed on its predecessor.

A Poetic Offering, Original and Select. 24mo. pp. 176. London, 1832. Fry. This is a very pretty-looking little book; but its contents are compounded on that system of literary piracy which we have always, and shall always, consider dishonest.

The Parent's Poetical Anthology; being a selection of English Poems, primarily designed for the use of Young Readers. Third edition, with additions. Pp. 472. London, 1832. Longman and Co.

THE title-page exactly states the plan of the work; and we have only to add, that it is carried into execution with much good taste and judicious selection. The volume is neatly bound in calico.

Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry-Second edition, corrected. 8vo. pp. 507. Dublin, 1832, W. Curry, junior, and Co.; London, Simpkin and Marshall; Edinburgh, Oliver and Boyd.

THIS little volume has passed, we see, into a second edition: we are glad that public opinion has so confirmed the praise we cordially bestowed on its first appearance, and which we now repeat. These pages are pictures of national manners, as accurate as they are lively; and for giving a dramatic reality to the scenes he describes, the author now before us is almost unrivalled. We believe him to be a

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

LORD BYRON, HIS BIOGRAPHY. &C.

[Conclusion of Capt. Medwin's letter.] His (Lord Byron's) dramas, highly picturesque, and full of poetry (which should be sparingly used in plays, and only by way of illustration). are failures by reason of the want of that very power of thinking for others, of giving the thoughts of others a local habitation, of making them incarnate as it were. The conspiracy in Marino Faliero (doubtless written in Romagna, during the rebellion of which Byron was one of the springs) has, for an opposite reason, all the force of truth and reality. In the somewhat whining regrets of the young Foscari, at being driven from his native city, he has depicted his own feelings; for he was always sighing in secret for that country whose climate, whose government, and whose people, he made the topic of a bitter satire and continual abuse: and in Sardanapalus, and Zarina, and the Ionian slave, we see typified himself, and Lady Byron, and the Guiccioli. Of Werner I shall not speak. It was an unworthy plagiarism from Miss Lee, and written solely for money, of which, as he became rich, he grew exceedingly fond, promising, had he lived, to realise the prediction (if it was one) of becoming a miser.

I have heard it argued that Lord Byron's poems owe almost all their interest to the mysterious interweaving of his own story into his compositions, and that his fame will therefore be only temporary, only last as long as that association lasts. There is unquestionably a strong family likeness in almost all his pictures ; but has not every poet and painter (Shake-speare and Raphael are out of the argument) some particular style or favourite subject? and does this detract from the individual merit of Salvator Rosa's landscapes, with their Calabrian and bandit-peopled wildernesses?

A time will come when Byron's works must be judged of by their intrinsic qualities; for the world, when this generation is past, will cease to think or care about his domestic quarrelsthe causes of his separation from Lady Byronhis Fornarinas, or his Guicciolis-more than it now does about Mrs. Milton or Martha Blount. But to return to Mr. Murray: he, in his mock-justification, says, that nothing ever occurred to subvert the friendly sentiments Lord Byron entertained for him. On my quitting Pisa, he gave me a memorandum on an open slip of paper, mixed up with other memoranda, to be read to Mr. Murray or his principal clerk, and which I did so read in Albemarle Street, couched in these words: " Lord Byron wonders he has not heard from Mr. Murray on receipt of his new cantos of Don Juan, and desires him to be less negligent in future." All I can say is, with regard to Mr. Murray, that every thing I know of him came from Lord Byron; that every word contained in my book respecting Mr. Murray was taken down from the mouth of Lord Byron; and that I will shew that Journal, which has been seen by several of my friends, at any time, to any person whom Mr. Murray may appoint.

A part of Lord Byron's creed was a belief in the omnipotence of the Quarterly, and in the infallibility of Mr. Gifford. Affecting as he did, through the whole of his poetical career, to despise public opinion, no man was a greater slave to those ghouls and vampires of the press, who prey upon the dead and suck the blood of the living; no writer of the day, however subaltern, held the criticis in more sovereign awe. In obedience to the Aristarchus of the day, he gave up the drama; and from an impression, of instantly publishing it, as I earnestly rehowever erroneous it might be, of Mr. Murray's influence over that review, avoided, for a long time, coming to an open rupture with him. There is one question, and only one, I would put to Mr. Murray. Shortly after, or about the time of, Lord Byron's difference with him and change of publisher, did he, or did he not, have printed, and circulate among his (Mr. Murray's) friends, the autograph of a private note, or a very familiar paragraph in one, tending to throw ridicule on Lord Byron? I hope I was misinformed; otherwise, from Mr. Murray at least, the charge of a breach of confidence, from him who has raked together every scrap of correspondence with his noble patron, comes with a bad grace. If conversations are sacred, should not letters be held still more so?

I have been most furiously handled by the critics, and not very fairly dealt with by Mr. Moore, who says, in speaking of my work, that the Conversations were after-recollections: now, I must have a most miraculous memory if it were so. But, as I said, that Journal is open to the inspection of all the world; besides that Mr. Moore's book furnishes ample proofs of its authenticity, and how much I really was in the secret. It is indeed strange, that in many passages of Mr. Moore's Memoirs. whole sentences should be found almost in the identical words Byron used to me. That work of mine had no pretensions to authorship. It occupied me scarcely three weeks, and was taken literally from my diary. Whilst employed in it at Geneva, I had no means of consulting a single English book by way of reference. One of Lord Byron's biographers laughs at the idea of my quoting Latin; perhaps I might return the compliment, and smile at his translations from the Greek, witness the following specimen of pure Cockneyism:

Λοισσαμιναι τινιρα χροτα Γιρμισσοιο, H immou zenons n Oxusion Carisio.

"Having first been
With their succet limbs inside of Hippocrene,
Or other sacred waters of the Hill." — Leigh Hunt.

Another objection made to my work has been, that I had no right to have divulged conversations, &c. My reply is, that they were not of a private or confidential nature: that Lord Byron made a boast of his early excesses, and was indifferent to the world knowing them: that among all the abuse (now forgotten) lavished on Boswell, it was never made a point of accusation against him that he published Dr. Johnson's conversations, though his journal was kept expressly for that purpose; whilst mine was made with no such view, and but for the burning of the autograph memoirs, would never have seen the light.

Having been constantly abroad since 1825. and having little access to the periodical publications of the day, I have been ignorant, till very lately, of the extent to which my " good name has been lied away." I am now inclined to despise the slanderers, though I cannot help considering myself grievously ill used by Mr. Colburn, who left all my letters unanswered, for what purpose is best known to himself-requested, kept it until it would have been useless to have done so; so that I was finally under the necessity of withdrawing it. A vituperative article in Blackwood's Magazine I have not seen: but it is said to be by the same heavy hand. That person comes down with his ponderous aledge-hammer contradictions as though he were forging a thunder-bolt; and with all his din and smithery, fuss and fury, only displaces a comma, or transposes a date—the date and the comma being alike unimportant :- not so the critic, whatever he does costs such a prodigious effort that it must be great; and he thinks the ring he collects around him to witness his prowess are admiring his hard hitting, when they are chiefly struck with his want of breath and temper. I could have wished (I speak all this while of the Westminster reviewer) that he had pointed out some graver errors in my work, and had laid less stress on trifles. The charges are in themselves nothing; all that one can distinctly make out is the wonderful air of business, dogmatism, and pedantry, and self-importance with which they are brought forward. Au reste, he has the laugh against me in one or two places for blunders or slips of the pen,—a triumph well suited to his good-nature and magnanimity. I remember laughing very heartily about the Old Bailey - every knows the anecdote. Tu trembles, Bailli, &c. Lord B. quotes it in Marino Faliero; but it is not at all clear that Byron did not allude to some other trial. Strafford, who fell a victim to Titus Oates (and the race does not seem extinct), asked for a cloak lest he should tremble with cold, and it might be mistaken for fear; and probably some prisoner in the Old Bailey made a similar remark. But even if a blunder, however ludicrous, nothing can more strongly prove the authenticity of the conversation itself. This anonymous writer insists much upon Lord Byron's extreme love of veracity. We now know how much he is to be relied upon. In a letter (which I am sorry I have not now before me) addressed by Lord Byron many years ago to M. Pichot, the translator of Byron, and author of an admirable essay on his life, and character, and writings, Lord Byron perverts, in a most extraordinary way, the facts respecting William Lord Byron's duel with Mr. Chaworth, and "Mad Jack" attractive, without my consent; but the book itself states fully that I never resided with Lord Byron.

2. "That the invitation of Professor Pictet was an impudent liberty of Polidori." Lord Byron went to a sorre at M. Pictet's, and thought himself bound to return the civility. This dinner, without Amphytrion, gave great umbrage to the screent, which would not have been the case if as stated by the critic. I have this from one of the professor's own family.

3. "That Lord Byron never had a boatman." M. Hentch, the banker, says in a letter to me—"Je donnai le tout en garde au bateller Meurice, compagnon d'eau de votre celebre ami."

4. "That Lord Byron's courier did not carry all the de votre celebre ami."

4. "That Lord Byron's courier did not carry all the eight pairs of pistols." How important, whether they were carried by one or two servants! The reviewer was born to contradict.

5. "That a picture of Giorgioni's, at Venice, was not like the Countess Guiccioli." What a chiaro! as the Romentess.

6. "That Madame Guiccioli was not sixteen, but

Byron's conduct and treatment of the Mar-|very extraordinary man. If I had underrated chioness of Carmarthen, for the purpose, no his tone of conversation, or given a false colour doubt, of screening his ancestors from reproach.

I state this as I might do his saying, from motives of vanity, that he was brought up at Mar Lodge, instead of a miserable lodging in Edinburgh, merely to prove that he thought nothing of deviating from the strict line of truth.

There are two subjects on which he was very fond of vapouring - shooting and swimming; and the affair with Sir John Cam Hobhouse, according to the Westminster Review, turns out to have been a kind of bravado at pistolpractice. Was it pure invention on the part of Lord Byron? In his account of the duel between Cecil and Stackpoole, he seems to have taken leave of his memory, or to have been quite misinformed. To shew also how fond he was of throwing doubt even on trifles-I was present when a person asked him how his name ought really to be pronounced: his answer, with one of his smiles, was, What does by spell?
Now, as he always called Lady B. Bur-on himself, he was only dealing, of course, in one of his usual mystifications. I have been also taken to task, among other accusations, for not doing justice to Lord Byron's conversational powers as a reporter. No man was, perhaps, so desultory in conversation. He not only never argued, but rarely reasoned, and flew from topics to topics, like an ignis fatuus, dazzling and astonishing, but throwing no very clear light on any. I have often felt astonishment, after being with him for hours, to find he had said so little worth carrying away,— his talk being about persons and things of no interest ;-some illustrious obscure -some gossip of fashionable life, to which he clung with a strange thirst of aristocracy. So much was he embued with this, that I am convinced he would always have preferred the company of the silliest of his brother peers to that of the most enlightened commoner: with one exception, if he had not been Byron, he would have wished to have been Brummel. Shelley some-times contrived to inveigle him into being serious — in these moments he was really de-lightful — but they were like angels' visits, few and far between. Religion he would rarely discuss, and had an evident fear of confessing to himself his unbelief.

It may be thought that my defence now comes late; but on a literary question the lapse of time can make no difference. Though the wounds I have received no longer bleed, the scars remain. The difference between my enemies and myself is, that what I state are facts, positive truths; whilst they endeavoured, by their influence over a venal press, well characterised by that Juvenal of the age, the author of the Tauroboliad, to injure by falsehoods, known falsehoods, one who was not present to justify himself, who stood single, and was, therefore, a fair mark for detraction and calumny.

The real question before the public is, not whether the facts are true or false in themselves, but whether I had an opportunity of seeing Lord Byron, and reporting his conversations; whether I took down notes of what occurred between us, and whether the result is not a lively and faithful picture of the ordinary mode of passing his time and habits of that to his character, or misrepresented his estimate of contemporary talent, or taken away the life and spirit of an interesting anecdote by the way of telling it, the public would have had reason to complain; nor would the work be in the repute it is abroad,—have been translated four times into French, and been reprinted so often in France, Germany, and Belgium. All the critiques have had little effect on the material objects of the book; and were the mistakes corrected, it would require the typographical genius of a reviewer to find out the difference. I take this opportunity, once for all, of declaring, that I do not consider myself responsible in any degree for the materials; or liable, in the most distant manner, to be called upon to advocate the authenticity of any one anecdote contained in my volume. These must rest with Lord Byron—must stand or fall on his authority. When I met him at Pisa, I had just returned from India. Many of the topics of his conversation were new to me, most of his contemporaries unknown. It is monstrous to suppose I could have had any interest in libelling them. That unpretending sketch, such as it is, is not altogether valueless. Lord Byron is there seen en déshabille :-- with Messrs. Moore and Murray (knowing that all he wrote would appear after his death), he was playing a part. When and where did he not mystify? Did he ever tell a story twice in the same way? But if Lord Byron had no friendship for Messrs. Moore and Murray, it will be evident, from the following anecdote, that one at least of them entertained none for him.

A farewell dinner was given to Mr. Moore on his leaving Paris for England. He was the rosy god of the feast-sung his Bacchanalian songs to his own accompaniment on the piano, and improvised (about as much as the French orators do) his speeches piquante as their dishes. The toasts being ended, I was surprised that Lord Byron had been forgotten; and concluding the omission accidental, sent a line to Mr. Moore across the table to that effect. Mr. Moore, strange to say, shook his head, and declined the proposal. Sir Godfrey Webster, one of the vice-presidents, was then applied to, and instantly gave the toast in the handsomest manner.

Why analyse Mr. Moore's motives for thus publicly disowning one for whom he was daily professing friendship in his letters, and to whom he had lately been indebted for 20001.? These motives are only to be found in a littleness of spirit unworthy of his genius.* Perhaps he wished to be thought, at least that day, the greatest of living poets. To have named Byron would have reduced him to his proper sphere - his own comparatively diminished standard. Perhaps Lord Byron's politics were little in unison with those of some of his Amphytrions present. I only state the fact. 1 have no time to round my periods, or polish my sentences; but being only a dilettante in letters, perhaps this will pass muster, as we say; and, with admiration of your singular magnanimity, in true editorial style, I am, sir,

Your constant reader, London, Jan. 28, 1832. T. MEDWIN

As the following letter is connected with the foregoing, and also presents a high foreign opinion on the subject, we have much pleasure in adding it.

To the Editor of the Literary Gazette.

Sir. - Captain Medwin's merciless expose of Lord Byron's character, although it may please some, will displease many. There are few of us who would yield a ready assent to the destruction of an idol we have set up in our hearts, although the destroyer may be able to overwhelm us with the most cogent arguments of its worthlessness. On such occasions we are apt to shift and shuffle, and look about us for some loop-hole or other by which we may creep out, to preserve the object of our worship. This is precisely my case with Byron; and I am therefore delighted to find that many German writers of the modern politico-literary school have set up a plea for his character, which may still enable us to esteem the man whose magnificent strains have so long enchanted us. The following passage, from a recent review of Wilhelm Müller's works by the celebrated southern critic Wolfgang Menzel, fully illustrates the view which these gentlemen take of the noble bard; and as it has proved a comfort to me, I generously offer it in an English garb to the readers of the Literary Gazette. "He (Müller) condemns, with most recent critics, Byron's delight in the harsh, the distorted, the disgusting, the horrible, the immoral, and the demoniacal; but he explains this phenomenon solely from the aristocratical caprice of a rich lord; or, at most, from some adverse events of his life, instead of regarding it as connected with the great events of the world, and flowing from 'the grief of the age,' which is the only way to account for it. A poet like Byron does not belong to private life, he is a link of the universal history of man. Who can mistake in his fearful lays the old song of the fettered Prometheus, the deep-glowing grief, the mor-tally wounded pride, the noble madness of the Titan, who sees his creatures in the power of a hostile god, he being bound to the rock, and his heart a prey to the devouring vulture, raves in horrid despair against gods and men? Great men feel such pains; and Byron has too often expressed in his poems his indignation at the pitifulness of our age, to allow us to ascribe his terrible humour to mere family squabbles, or to bare affectation." MR. GRIFFITHS on the chemical signs of the alchemists. The lecturer has pursued this subject with a view to the elucidation of the writings of that singular but industrious, and we may add, in relation to the early progress of knowledge, useful class of men, the alchemists. Their signs had figurative meanings, expressive of qualities: ex. gr. the metals were represented by the signs in astronomy; gold, as the most valuable, Nol: silver, as partaking of the qualities of gold, though paler in brightness, Luna, — and so forth. In chemistry some of the signs, it must be allowed, were very applicable: residuum in distillation, for instance, was typified by the caput mortuum, or death's head, to shew that all spirit was gone, and nought but the grosser substance left behind; the crucible_from crucio, to torment, because in it metals were tortured to yield up their powers and virtues-was represented by a cross. Examples of this sort might be multiplied to a great extent; but we pass them over, being of opinion that the days have gone by when it [•] Having accorded a place in the Literary Gazette to Capt. Medwin's statement, we have felt that it would be injustice to alter it: but we must again repeat, that these sentiments are not ours, and that we much condemn the sentiments are not ours, and that we much condenn the practice of imputing unworthy motives, where far other considerations might readily explain the course adopted and the things said and done—Red. Mr. Griffiths' observations displayed much acquaintance with the subject; and if some of his applications of the signs appeared recherché, they were frequently very ingenious. He was exceedingly well received.

Mr. Faraday then produced the machine, now in course of construction by Mr. Bates, for engraving plates of medals directly from the medals themselves, and explained its principle and mode of working. In the library were two fine series of the new coinage, so beautifully executed by Wyon; Mr. Cooper's Gothic window, coloured by polarised light; and other objects of interest in the arts and sciences.

EXPEDITION TO THE NIGER.

IT is, we are informed, the intention of a company of merchants at Liverpool to equip a steamer of 100 tons burden, and other vessels, for a trading voyage up the Niger. We have further learned, that the merchants have it in contemplation to send a limited number of Moravian missionaries with the expedition. who are to remain in the country; though this matter is, we believe, as yet undecided. The vessels, it is expected, will leave Liverpool about May next.

ROYAL SOCIETY.

H. R. H. the Duke of Sussex, president, in the chair.—A paper by Capt. W. H. Smyth, R.N., F.R.S., on the new volcanic island in the Mediterranean, was read. The President, in submitting this valuable communication to the Society, stated that it was written as a report to the council upon Dr. Davy's paper on the same subject, read a few weeks ago; but that the council viewed it as containing so much original and important matter, nautical as well as more generally scientific, that they had determined upon its being read as a separate paper. Captain Smyth's deductions in this communication satisfactorily refute the unfounded theories so widely extended by Prévost, and other continental writers, as well as those of some of our own countrymen, on the subject of the geological origin of this singular island. The papers next read were a continuation of physical researches in astronomy, by Mr. Lubbock; and a further portion of Sir Charles Bell's, on the human voice. Sir Charles considers the glottis as the source of sound; but to the details of his paper we may hereafter refer, when the reading of it shall have been concluded. Dr. Von Buch, of Berlin, presented his geological chart of the island of Teneriffe.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.

MR. HAMILTON in the chair.-Among other presents to the Society was one from Mr. Kempe. at the request of Mrs. Bray, of the concluding number of the late Chas. Stothard's beautiful work, the Monumental Effigies of Great Britain, with an additional number containing letterpress elucidations of the plates, by Mr. Kempe. Mr. Knight presented drawings of the groundplan and interior of a building called Queen Elizabeth's bath, on the site of the King's Mews, Charing Cross, and which was removed for the improvements there in February 1831. Mr. Knight observed that the building was of brick, apparently of the fifteenth century, and its principal feature was the massive groined roof, springing from very substantial corbels. He stated that he heped shortly to communicate

Mr. Gage communicated, as an accompaniment to his account of St. Ethelwold's Benedictional, in the possession of the Duke of Devonshire, lately noticed, a description of an illuminated manuscript of the tenth century, called the Benedictional of Archbishop Robert, preserved in the public library at Rouen. It contains several of the benedictions in that of St. Ethelwold, but is not so finely executed in some of the initial letters, nor in the colouring of the paintings. It is the work of the monks of Newminster, at Winchester, and is presumed to have been executed for Ethelgar, Archbishop of Canterbury. It contains three miniatures. which were certainly done by Boanarges, the painter of St. Ethelwold's MS., or by some one of the same school. Fac-simile specimens were exhibited of the writing and the paintings of both works; and the latter are so similar, that it is quite evident one was copied from the other, or both from the same original; and the similarity of the writing would lead us to suppose that both MSS, had come from the same hand.

ROYAL ASIATIC SOCIETY.

RIGHT HON. C. W. W. WYNNE in the chair. The following donations were presented: From Colonel Colebrooke, a treatise on scholastic divinity, Malayan MS., and a commentary upon Abdurrahmen Jiorjani's treatise of Arabic Grammar, Arabic MS.: these MSS. were given to Col. C. by the Sultan of Pangerang; - from Colonel Tod, a very highly finished Hindu drawing, representing the Durbar, or levée, of his Highness Doulut Rao Scindia, one of the Mahratta chieftains, -with portraits of himself and many of his military chieftains and civil officers of state. His Excellency Charles Colville, G.C.B., governor of the Mauritius, was elected a non-resident member of the Society. The conclusion of Chevalier Graberg's account of the History of the Berbers, by Iba Khaldun, was read; and a notice of the wild dog of the Western Chauts, by Capt. W. H. Sykes, of the Bombay army. This animal is called kolsun by the natives; it belongs to the class Mammalia, order carnivora, tribe digitigrada, genus canis; and is considered by Captain Sykes to be an undescribed variety. The specimen from which his account is drawn up, was taken by some hunters in his employ, on the 15th of May, 1828, who coming unawares on a pack of them, when making their way through a jungle, killed this indi-vidual by a blow on the head with a stick, it not having activity enough to make its escape; which was soon accounted for by finding that it was completely gorged with the remains of a deer, &c. The colour is a uniform bright red; the tail is bushy, having the hairs red at the base, and black at the tips. The animal is about 18 inches in height, and its extreme length, from the nose to the end of the tail, is 3 feet 8 inches and a quarter. These dogs are stated by the natives of the Ghauts to hunt in packs, and attack the royal tiger. In their combats with this beast, they are said to urine on their own tails, which they switch into the tiger's eyes, who being thus blinded, is easily vanquished. Thanks were ordered to be returned to the communicators of these papers, and the meeting was adjourned to the 18th instant.

In our last week's account, the date of Colonel Tod's Sauscrit inscription should have been A.D. 925, instead of 1037.

PINE ARTS. BRITISH GALLERY.

THE annual exhibition at the British Gallery, for the sale of the works of modern artists, to which we briefly alluded in our last Number, opened to the public on the 7th instant; and we are happy to say, that a re-inspection con-firms the opinion which we have already expressed, that the lovers of the fine arts will find in it abundant examples of excellence in the various departments of painting. We are sure that they will admire; we hope that they will not rest maisfied with admiration, but that they will be stimulated to encourage the talent which is the source of their pleasure.

In conformity to the good old rule, we " begin with the beginning.

No. 1. Pertemouth, from the King's Bastion. Painted by command of his Majesty. C. Stanfield. - The name of Stanfield, although (for what reason we know not) yet unhonoured by the addition of any academic initials, stands so high in this class of art, that it is gratifying to see that the royal commands have been given to one capable of obeying them in so satisfactory a manner. We understand that the taste of our beloved sovereign leads him to admire matter of fact in the arts, as well as in affairs of more importance. This may perhaps account for the simple fidelity of the performance under our notice. Although, however, it cannot boast of the grandeur of effect by which "St. Michael's Meunt," "the Wreckers," and some other of Mr. Stanfield's works, have been distinguished, the truth of its character is very pleasing.

No. 19. The Contadina di Sonnino. George Hayter.—When we recollect that admirable little picture, "the Trial of Lord William Russell," it is impossible not to feel regret that the artist who produced so fine a work should have been induced to waste his talents on a subject like this. There is some grace and beauty in the figure; but the colouring is meagre and crude, and there is neither keeping nor repose.

No. 39. Study from Nature. Mrs. Carpenter. -Charming! The expression is replete with the innocence and sprightliness of childhood; and the clearness and brilliance of the tints cannot be surpassed.

No. 29. Card-Players. T. Webster .- The triumph of the one player, with his sequence of honours, and the mortification of the other, who is ashamed even to shew his hand, are entertainingly depicted; and there is an excellent effect of Flemish chiaroscuro.

No. 30. The Rick Side. No. 206. Cressing the Ford. T. Woodward. — No one, from the title of the first of these works, would expect to find an able study of a bey, a horse, and a dog. With respect to the second of them, we consider it to be one of the finest productions in the class of art to which it belongs that ever came under our notice. The drama of this beautiful little gem is as follows :- Two lads, on the back of an old gray horse, are crossing a ford, and have left their poor dog howling on the far side. The expression of the elder boy, who is whistling to induce Tray to follow, and that of the younger, who, apprehensive of the water, is clinging closely to his companion, are admirable. Wouvermans never surpassed the colouring of the horse, especially in the halftints; and the background is thrown in with a happy carelessness of pencil which, to an artist's eye, is very fascinating.

No. 60. Bit of Courtship. J. P. Knight ... Cleverly painted, although rather obtrusive in colour. We presume that the lady has money.

Her countenance reminds us of a passage in one of poor Till Allingham's farces, entitled "the Widow's Choice;" in which Fawcett and Liston were astounded by what they mistakingly conceived to be the portrait of a wealthy dame, of whom they had both become enamoured without having seen her. Endea-vouring to reconcile himself to the ugliness which was too manifest to be denied, the one at length exclaimed, "Well! after all, there's something in that face - it is not beauty." " No! I'll be d_d if it is!" replied the other.

No. 52. An Antiquary. A. Fraser .- An assemblage of objects which tell no story, but which give Mr. Fraser an opportunity of dis-playing his remarkable skill in rivalling the tones and the handling of Rembrandt and Teniers. The quotation attached to this picture in the catalogue is strangely inappropriate

No. 67. Dream of Queen Katharine. H. Howard, R.A. .- A subject well suited to Mr. Howard's pencil, and executed in a style at once imaginative and sublime. The countenance of the once haughty, but now feeble and fragile queen, under the influence of her vision, has little more substance than the beatific forms by which she is surrounded,

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Mazeppa. Painted by Horace Vernet; engraved by J. G. S. Lucas. Harding; Cormick.

A VERY spirited pair of prints, engraved in mezzetinto. The pursuit by the welves is fine; but in our opinion the death of the at last exhausted stool is finer. Herace Vernet has long been celebrated for his skill in depicting the horse; and his wild troop is worthy of his reputation, and admirably embodies the animated description of the post :--

With flowing tail and flying mane, Wide nostrils—never stretch'd by pain, Mouths bloodless to the bit or rein; And feet that iron never shod, And flanks unacarred by spur or rod.

They stop—they start—they snuff the air, Gallop a moment here and there—Approach, retire, wheel round and round, Then plumging back with sudden bound, Headed by one black mighty steed, Who seem'd the patriarch of his breed, Without a single speck or hair of white upon his shaggy hide:
They snort—they foam—neigh—swerve as And backward to the forest fly, By instinct, from a human eye."

Illustrations of the Vaudois, in a Series of Views. Engraved by Edward Finden, from Drawings by Hugh Dyke Acland, Esq.

To all to whom indomitable courage, and the ardent love of civil and religious freedom are dear, the history of the persecuted, but ulti-mately triumphant, Vaudois, must ever be interesting; and it is rendered peculiarly so at the present moment, in consequence of the notice which has been recently taken of the subject in Parliament by Sir Robert Inglis. The work before us is a re-publication, in s separate form, of the plates which embellished Mr. Acland's volume, published in 1827, under the title of The Glorious Recovery by the Vaudois of their Valleys. It is preceded by an introductory outline of the most remarkable incidents in that memorable struggle; and every plate is accompanied with a brief description. The views are singularly beautiful and picturesque in themselves; and their value is heightened by a reference to the undying associations connected with them.

FRAME TABLETS

WE have seen several beautiful specimens of frame tablets, lately published by Messrs. Vizetelly, Branston, and Co., for mounting drawings, coloured lithographs, &c. The objects aimed at, and, in our opinion, attained, in their production are, -to give them the effect of projection, without the surface being actually raised, and that they should so blend with the drawing as to seem to form a part of it; so that, compared with what has been usually applied to the same purpose, these tablets possess superior effect, with the advantages of lying flat in the portfolio or album, and of not being so liable to soil. They are also considerably cheaper; in many cases not more than half the price. We understand that, in various patterns, tints, and sizes, there are above four hundred different kinds.

RIGGRAPHY.

DEATHS OF MR. CRABBE AND OF JOE MUNDEN.

On Friday the 3d, and Monday last, we have lost, each at an advanced age (Mr. Crabbe 73, and Munden 74), two men distinguishedcertainly longo intervallo - but still highly distinguished in their several lines; the one in the poetical literature of England, and the other in the theatrical art. Of Crabbe, as a poet, it is unnecessary for us to speak: his vivid pictures of human nature, under almost every form to be witnessed in the ordinary scenes of life, are as inimitable as they were original; his works are a portion of the standard and everlasting monuments upraised in the English language, and so long as that lasts they cannot perish.*
And poor Munden, one of the most perfect artists that ever adorned the mimic stage - he, with all his quaintness and drollery (and pa-thos too), has made his final exis. We shall not look upon his like again.

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

THE GARRICK CLUB PAPERS.

Under the above Sign and Title, it is our purpose (as already stated) to devote a series of papers to dramatic illustrations, not merely confined to the business and productions of the hour, but taking a wider range, for the interest of the theatrical world. In order to promote this design, with the approbation of the committee, and at the desire of many members, of the Garrick Club, a letter-box will be placed in the library of that society, for the reception of all communications; if relating facts, to be authenticated by real signatures; if merely sportive, or humorous, with or without that guarantee. Whatever relates to managers, actors, audiences, and the public, will be fairly considered by a sub-committee, to whose charge the box will be consigned; and nothing which can tend to correct error, or to do good, will be neglected. We have only, as labourers in a common cause, willingly offered the Literary Gazette as their organ; and shall begin with what we deem to be a very fine composition.

• We subjoin a list of his works: — The Library, a possa, 4to. 1781; The Village, a poem, 4to. 1783; The Skull, a poem, 4to. 1783; The Newspeper, a poem, 4to. 1785; Sermon on the Death of the Duke of Rutland (to whom the author was chaplain), 4to. 1798; Poems, 8vo. 1807—7th edition, 1812; The Borough, a poem, foolscap 8vo. 1810—4th edition, 1812; Tales in Verse, 8vo. 1812.

CHORUS FROM THE SEVEN BEFORE THEBES OF ESCHYLUS.

[The two brothers Eteocies and Polynices are supposed to be just gone out to fight.]

Strophe 1.

Strophe 1.

Thou evil prophetes: dread power! Goddess or flend, whate'er you be-For of the gods is none like thee—I see thee come in thine own hour, To consummate a funeral dower; Unnatural strife, unnatural ire, The curses of a frantic sire.

Antistrophs 1.

The sword that made two brothers foes,
And keen the edge in either hand,
Was forged in Seythia's iron strand.
What patrimony had they?—woes;
What heritage their days to close?
What deatiny? the fate of slaves;
What kingdom? space but for their graves.

Strophe 2. When brother falls by brother slain,
And earth, polluted, drinks the tide,
The crimson stream of fratricide,
What power shall purify again?
What explation cleanse the stain?
New crimes on old, and wee on woe,
Is all the end their house shall know.

Antistrophe 2.

But why this thrice-told warning tell?
Th' oracular voice is heard at last,
The generations foo are past:
That speed which tracks the steps of ill
Pursues the race of Laius still,
Who, passion-billoded, would not see
His own, the city's destiny.

Strophe 3.

To better counsels conscience-mute,
He wedded misery, grim bride,
And propagated particide.
The seed might well produce the fruit;
The stem must have a bloody root:
Madness and blindness both had he
To plough such soil, and graft such tree.

An issued and an area such tree
Antistrophe 3.

Ills swell like seas, as fast—and now
As one subsides, another raves,
And still a third with mightier waves,
To whelm the vessel, strikes the prow.
And shall our towers withstand the blow?
Our walls are weak, their circuit wide,
The foe is strong, and fierce the tide.

Strophs 4.

Curses sink not into the grave!
The deadly feud 'twixt son and son
Must end but there. The strife's begun,
The billows rise, the tempests rave!
Blind man, would you your weak bark save,
Go, lighten her of half her hoard,
And throw the cargo o'er the beard!

Antistrophe 4.

Then boast not of your richest freight,
Or think of (Edipus the while,
So mighty once, so proud and great,
That gods grow envious of his state;
And Thebes, who beaked in plenty's smile,
Hailed, from the Sphinx's bondage free,
In him almost a deity.

Strophe 5.
But saddest change was his, to find
That all things were as prophesided
A murdered aire, a mother-bride.
A maddening fremsy seized his mindTo end his crimes came suicide;
But first a deed of night was done,
Of night befitting such a son!

Antistrophe 5.

The curse remains: the hour is come, invoked in bitterness of hate,
That imprecated hour! and fate,
The sword, and vengeance, seal their doom;
Their thirst of sway but blood can sate.
Then haste thou murderer of a sire!
Fury! arise, and glut your ire!

Islington, Feb. 4, 1832.

Sir,-In the Literary Gazette, No. 684. February 27, 1830, was an excellent article on the motion made by the Hon. G. Lamb, in the are rather short this week). House of Commons, for securing their copyright to dramatic authors. The bill, it seems, fell to the ground, not from any opposition to its principle, but from its provisions being illdigested. It is understood that the subject is now in the hands of Lord Viscount Mahon. As the claims of the minor theatres must compel a discussion of the present state of the drama in the house, is not this the golden opportunity for uniting the complaints of authors as well as actors, which if now lost, the former, I fear, from the pressure of public affairs, will have little chance of being attended to? If the well-informed writer of the article alluded to, would state, in a communication to the Literary Gazette, what the legal provisions of the French system are, which secure to authors their right against the chicanery of managers, both in Paris and in the provinces. it would probably much benefit the cause; and if he would add what is the pratique of the French stage regarding the portion of the receipts paid to authors from the different theatres in Paris, as well as what fixed sums are usually given by the provincial theatres for each representation of a new piece, he would much oblige an old subscriber. L. K.

Upon this letter we have to observe, that the article on dramatic copyright to which L. K. refers, in No. 684 of the Literary Gazette, contains nearly all the information to be gleaned from the Code Dramatique, published in Paris, that could be of any service to the cause of theatricals in this country. "The legal provisions of the French system, which secure to authors their right against the chicanery of managers," are incompatible with the laws of England. In France, the nightly receipts of each theatre are inspected by the agents of government, who deduct proportionate sums for the relief of the poor; and, strange as it may appear, for the support of the Academy of Music (the grand French opera). It is, therefore, impossible for the manager, without great risk, to deceive the author, or his agents. respecting the profits of his play; but such an inquisition here could not be permitted. The objections to the bill brought forward by the Hon. G. Lamb were, its giving the power of summary conviction to magistrates; and the startling fact, that the counterfeiting the written permission of an author to act his play would be forgery, and must be punished as such. It is now proposed to give an author redress by bringing his action against the offending manager. "Sue a beggar, and catch "The proverb is somewhat musty." "Redress," quoth'a! The extra costs of his own attorney would swallow up all he could possibly hope to recover from a country theatre, if he succeeded in getting a verdict; and should he fail through some quirk or quibble of the law? No, no; unless a manager is liable to be fined a round sum upon a common information, for breaking an act of Parliament, by the nearest justice of peace, he will continue to plunder the unfortunate dramatist, and leave him to his remedy-" the glorious uncertainty,"—which, in our opinion, is worse than the disease. The Literary Gazette was the first journal that called the attenone of the great causes of the decline of dramatic literature !

DRAMA.

KING'S THEATRE.

On Saturday last the lovers of combinations of sweet sounds, and the gossippers of soft words, who usually frequent the King's Theatre, were gratified by the opening of that magnificent establishment for the season. Considerable interest had been excited by the somewhat novel feature under which Mr. Monk Mason had assumed the direction; there seemed something of a higher order in the motive than a mere pecuniary speculation; and the naïveté with which, in his printed statement, he exposed the deficiencies of the opera system, and the earnestness evinced for their ation. remedy, announced at least the attempt at a better order of things. Nor can the opening be said, in justice, to have thrown any discredit on the new director's pretensions; his activity and taste are every where visible; the interior of the theatre has been freshly decorated; a new company got together; the orchestra remodelled; the scanty wardrobe replenished; and the dingy scenery repainted. Of the embellishments on the audience part of the house, we think it would be an improvement if a portion of the heavy dark drapings over the stocked the Adelphi. boxes were removed, as, in union with the crude green of the panelling, they form but a very disadvantageous frame-work for the exhibition of tableaux vivans. The chandelier is splendid; the ornament over the proscenium well placed, and in good harmony with the royallycoloured drop-scene which falls beneath. of the new scenes (as we have stated) reflect the highest credit on the artist, both for composition and execution. The one in the opera representing a bridge over the Tiber, and a view of ancient Rome with its Capitol and thousand edifices, is a most beautiful and classical conception; nor is the view of the Mole of Naples in the ballet less creditable to the painter. Of the company at this early period it is almost invidious to speak, as the impossibility of attracting any of the first-rate artists from the continent during the carnival has always caused the opera season in this country to commence with languor. The opera selected for the occasion was L'Esule di Roma of Donnizetti, which it will be quite sufficient to characterise as of a pleasing nature, but not containing any striking passages; with the exception, perhaps, mo (in the French papers) state, that this

We ought perhaps to say that it is projected | tion of the public to this scandalous abuse; and | of the "Si scenda alla tomba," at the commencement, and the "Ogni tormento" at the end of the second act. Both these elicited a others), now, at the eleventh hour, discovering unanimous encore: the first was admirably given by Signor Winter, whose powerfully harmonious voice and energetic acting made so lively an impression as to establish him pretty far on the road of public favour. The "Ogni tormento," by Madame de Meric, is the most charming morceau of the opera: it was sung with such inexpressible grace and effect, as to create regret that this lady had not been brought before the public in some other character, which would have afforded greater scope for the display of those powers of which she is so delightfully the mistress. The overture to the opera is the composition of Mr. Monk Mason, and was received with considerable applause. We must not allow it to escape notice, how great an improvement is perceptible in the choruses, &cc.; and that the band, led by Spagnoletti, is so perfect in its organisation as to leave nothing to be wished for.

The ballet, entitled Une Heure à Naples, is a slight trifle, being merely a vehicle for some admirable dancing, in which Albert and Madame Le Comte particularly distinguished themselves.

The costumes in the opera and ballet have not escaped the vigilance of the director, and those exhibited were classical and correct.

To Mr. Monk Mason we wish every success, and a plentiful quantity of that buoyancy of Irish heart under difficulty, which is most likely to lead to it; and we trust that an enlightened aristocracy, for whom this amusement has been chiefly formed (by the way, we missed some well-known ornaments of that order, on the first two nights), will warmly second with their countenance and support the spirited endeavours of their countryman to elevate the English opera in the scale of musical consider-

ADELPHI.

On Thursday, another novelty, entitled Chalk Farm, or Petticoats and Pistols, was produced at this theatre, and was ably supported by the talents of Mrs. Fitzwilliam, Reeve, Buckstone, et cetera. There is a great deal of common-life humour in this piece, which, with such compression as is usually made after a first representation, bids fair to add to the amusing variety with which its spirited managers have

SURREY THEATRE.

A DRAMA, founded on Mr. Bulwer's popular work, Eugene Aram, has been produced with great success at this theatre. The Surrey, we observe with much satisfaction, is generously opened on Tuesday next for the benefit of the Printers' Pension Society - a society which well merits the support of the literary world.

VARIETIES.

More posthumous Vitality. - We recently quoted from a contemporary an account of an artist being afflicted with insanity after his decease; and it would seem, from the Times of Thursday, that this is not a solitary instance of posthumous action. In the detail of the fate of the Nottingham rioters, it is stated that they, "as dying men, returned their grateful thanks to Mr. Payne for the indefatigable attention he had bestowed upon their cases, both before and since their execution."

The Volcanic Island .- Letters from Paler-island, which we have so frequently noticed, 1822 the population has increased 14,581, has finally sunk, and that its site is marked by a column of boiling water rising from the

The Lady Chapel. - At St. Mary Overies. the friends of the arts and sciences in the parish of St. Saviour, on Thursday rallied their forces against the miserable, mercenary spirit which would have destroyed this fine relic of antiquity. On a poll, their numbers were in so great a majority, that there is no reason to fear it can be overcome, though the voting would continue another day.

Ancient Coins. - A few days since, as some labourers on the estate of Mrs. Sheppard, of Campsey Ash, were felling an old pollard oak, they discovered two parcels of ancient coins, enclosed in thin lead cases; one of them was quite embedded in the solid part of the root. They are chiefly pennies, of Edward the Confessor and Harold the Second, and amounted altogether to nearly 600 pieces. What appears most singular is, that many of them are divided into halves and quarters, which evidently shew that at that remote period these divided parts were circulated as halfpence and farthings. Bury Herald.

Earthquake in Italy. - About half-past two o'clock, P. M., on the 13th, the shock of an earthquake was experienced in Italy. It was slightly felt in Rome, and committed considerable damage in parts of the country.

Wolfs the Missionary .- It is stated in the newspapers that this far-travelled individual has set out for Timbuctoo, leaving his lady at A lexandria

Suicides at Paris. - In a recent number of the Annales d'Hygiène there is a memoir on the suicides committed by persons in the several stages of life, in which the author, who has examined about 9000 judicial accounts of suicides in Paris from 1796 to 1830, thinks himself warranted in assuming -1. That philosophical, or premeditated suicide takes place during the night, and a little before day-break. 2. That accidental, or unpremeditated suicide take place during the day, because it is then that the occasional causes arise, such as quarrels, bad news, losses at play, intemperance, &c. &c. At every age man chooses particular modes of committing suicide. In youth he has recourse to hanging, which he soon abandons for firearms: in proportion as his vigour declines, he returns to his first mode; and it is most commonly by hanging that the old man perishes who puts an end to his existence. These considerations are extremely curious with respect to medical jurisprudence. The following table shews the mode of suicide the most common at different ages.

The author, it seems, has taken no account of self-destruction by poison, drowning, or other modes.

Roman Statistics .- A general view of the population of Rome, from Easter 1822 to Easter 1831, has just been published, from which we deduce the following particulars. In the course of last year the population had increased by 3,381. The whole population is now 150,666, exclusive of foreigners and Jews, of which there may be about 5000. Since glas, D.D. Bishop of Salisbury.

which is the more remarkable, as, from 1822 till now, the number of deaths exceeds that of baptisms by 2,705. But as the increase in the population has been gradual, and is probably correct, there must be errors in the lists of liths and deaths. In 1826, 1828, and 1829, there were more baptisms than burials: 1822 was the most fatal, the excess of deaths being 1948. In the years 1830-31, the number of baptisms is stated as 4,725, that of deaths baptisms is stated as 4,725, that of deaths 5,102; being an excess of 377. The decrease in the number of marriages, for some years past, is very remarkable. In 1824 there were 1396 marriages, in 1831 only 964, though the population is above 12,000 more than in 1824. The number of ecclesiastics, monks, nuns, &c. is now 5354; in 1822 it was 4714. These are the general results, as drawn from the tables; but on examining the details there are evidently several mistakes, or at least things which require explanation; for on summing up the baptisms and deaths, as stated in each of the ten years, we find a total excess of 2635 deaths, and yet the population is said to have increased 14,581!

General Observations.—Considerably more rain fell than in the corresponding month of the last two years; the month was also warmer, the extremes being higher, and the mean upwards of eight and a half degrees above the mean of December 1829, and six degrees higher than that of the same month last year. The maximum and minimum of the barometer nearly the same as last year: but the mean was forty-three hundredths of an inch higher, although not above the average of the month. From the 20th to the 30th the weather was particularly dull and heavy, with thick mist or fog.

The evaporation, .0625 of an inch.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CROERESPONDENTS.

CROLERA.—We have perused, with great attention, Mr. Ainsworth's Observations on Pestilential Cholera (8vo. pp. 172. Ebers), of which we have no hesitation in saying, that it presents us with a very complete body of actual observation made on numerous patients at Sunderland; and is also most deserving of perusal from its acculate description of the disease and its symptoms, of the various theories concerning it, and of the best means of cure to be applied at its various stages. Having also obtained some of the most striking publications of Germany and important manuscripts, on the same subject, we shall carefully digest the whole, extract the latest intelligence of able men, and, in the course of the next three or four Numbers, lay (we trust) a very interesting series of papers before our readers.

Mr. James's Biographies of great Military Commanders.

before our readers.

Mit. James's Biographies of great Military Commanders reached us too late for more than this passing notice, till next Saturday. We greatly like what a hurried glance has enabled us to see of the work.

A paper of Unrehearsed Stage Effects is also of necessity among the postponements; and we have to apologise for the omission of Advertisements. Our rule is—first come, first served.

Thoughts on the Death of a Bird are declined. We must say the same to Selim; and to ψ_2 though we would give a word of encouragement to the latter, as a young poet.

On the let of March will be published, peice 2s. No. I. of THE BRITISH MAGAZINE, and Monthly Register of Religious and Ecclesiastical Information. Perchial History, and Documents respecting the State of the Poor, Progress of Education, &c.

The Magazine new presented to the notice of the public, differs, in some important respects, from any at present a existence. While its chief aim will be undoubtedly to diffuse sound religious and moral information, it does not seek to be exclusively theological; but will embrace other topics connected almost directly with public improvement. The education of the poor, their moral and religious condition, and their temperal wants, are objects of paramount interest at present, both to the religious run and the political control of the poor, whether by societies with reports of their proceedings) or by individuals, and will be open to communication on these important points. On all these subjects, as well as on religious matern—on the state of the Church and Clergy, as well as of other religious bodies—it will seek to present facts and documents; and on this ground it will hope for the patronage of the lowers of truth is all parties, political and religious. For truth, in most of the points here alleded to, is only to be known by the careful collection, and careful eramination, of documents. All, therefore, who what he know the truth must wish for documents; and no one, whatever be his party, can wish to shrint from the inferences to which he may be conducted by the m, or fear that these faithful guides (if rightly used) will ever mislead him.

With respect to the Principles adopted in the Magazine, the Proprietors feel that they could not gain credit with reasonable men by professions that the management is intrused to persons helonging to the Church of Rugiand in the members of the Church of Rugiand if they, too, had theirs—that is to asy, if they had a journal which should not seek for discussions of matters where che Hughand if they, too, had theirs—that is to asy, if they will always be open to those who may wan to expense or transmit themselves against any charges or accusations conveyed in its pages.

They trust that the Clergy may find this Magazine a useful medium of communication on professional mattern—a medium which seems to them at present to be much wanted. They were the communication of an account of an account of a water than the contraction of the communication of the communication in conclusion, they invite notice to the following list of subjects, which they intend to comprehend in their Miscellaneous Department.

OPINIONS OF THE PUBLIC JOURNALS.

"The plan of this work is novel, and of a very interesting description. It is the realisation of that which has been often said, and often felt—that the annals with which the history of every country are this by strewn, are in themselves far more romantic than the happies inventions of the most ingenious novelists and poets. They are valuable illustrations of manners, and striking commentaries on the history of the country."—Timer.

"The plan of this work is excellent. It consists of tales, founded either on legendary love, tradition, or historical fact. Our limits will not permit any thing like analysis of the vast store of romantic deed and wild adventure contained in this work."—

Internate Gastelle.

After the grant of the property of the property of the property of the shelten, so to speak, belongs to the historian; but the flesh and blood, and the breath of life, pertain to the romanner. We have often regretted that historians (such as Hume, for instance), should have thought it necessary to plunder their narratives of all that was romantic and ep-sociatal, and, for the deeds and thoughts and words of nan, treat us to philosophical disquisitions and chapters of ingenous conjecture. —Atherwise. History, in its general character, makes no a speak to the feedings which are excited by romanner; but it has, when considered more narrowly in its details, many passages of deep and most stirring interest. The noblest deeds which fancy ascribes to her heroes have been performed by resi personages; and the fairest beings with which have possible, have had their protocypes in the world. The history of every country has records of the acts of the one, of the low, and beauty of the other; and the pages which are thus devoted to memorialist their fortunes, have in themselves the true elements of romance."—Monthly Resim.

"The design of moulding the romantic annals of different countries into so many series of tales, is one of unquestionable beauty."—Mirror.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

[Ar the awful crisis which has approached this country, long blessed with exemption from war, and famine, and pestilence, it is the duty of every organ of public intelligence to devote its utmost efforts to elucidate the most momentous subject which could demand investigation; to collect and disseminate all the information in its power; conect and disseminate an the internation in its power; not to contemn even theories and opinions, since, out of the vague guess and apparently unfounded surmise, it is yet possible that the light of truth and the discovery of a curavague guess and apparently uncounced surmise, it is yet possible that the light of truth and the discovery of a curative system may spring; and, in fine, to learn and publish whatever can inform the national mind, or, perchance, suggest a hint which may contribute to the national welfare and safety. We shall not pretend to decide (indeed we think it would be better were wiser and more instructed professional men to argue less dogmatically on these topics) whether the disease is contagious or non-contagious, epidemic, dependant for its causes on atmosphere, or earth, or electricity, or other natural phenomena; it shall suffice for us to deal as much as may be with facts and personal observation, and from actual circumstances, still proper them from learned hynotheses (though not neaffeces). personal observation, and from actual circumstances, still more than from learned hypotheses (though not negligent of the latter), to deduce such results as must tend to impede and mitigate the fearful scourge which has come amongst us; and, above all, to give such advice as will improve the condition of the suffering poor, and lead, beyond their temporary succour, to a more permanent system of Christian charity than has heretofore prevailed. We are not grumblers nor levellers, scoffers at the high, nor abusers of the wealthy; but if we have a sense of satisfaction at the alarm so naturally occasioned, it is that it will, generally, teach the comfortable and the rich something more of sympathy for the distresses of the lower nor abusers of the wealthy; but if we have a sense of satisfaction at the alarm so naturally occasioned, it is that it will, generally, teach the comfortable and the rich something more of sympathy for the distresses of the lower orders. A fellow-feeling of terror will make many kind among the gay luxurious proud, who, lapt in their own enjoyments, have thought but too little of the half-clothed and ill-feel multitudes of their fellow-creatures—of the cold and houseless children of want. And may we not hope that the spirit of philanthropy will extend yet farther? During a thunder-storm a salutary awe creeps over the hard-hearted, and abakes the guilty oppressor, which vanishes too quickly as the calm returns: but with this deadly adversary threatening at their doors, and their precarious lives hanging on a few hours' warning, we will trust that the hand of rigour will, in many a case, be stayed, and the claims of humanity speak in a voice less likely to be drowned by sordid selfishness. Should this be so, even plague will be a blessing compared with the starving paupers, the widows and orphans cast into the streets for a modicum of reut, the industrious artisans pillaged by the low harpies of the law, and immured for trifling debts with felons in our crowded gaols—the wide-spread desolation and misery inflicted by the evil passions of manupon man. Let us not be supposed to underrate or undervalue the benevolence which so honourably distinguish our country; but we cannot shut our eyes to the broad conclusion, that in no civilized community which exists, or ever existed, has so much wretchedness among the numerical mass of the population prevailed as in Britain. The monstrously unequal division of property, the harsh administration of harsh laws, the almost universal boost of sordidness as a principle, and practice of it as a rule of conduct, and a consequent change of manners which has separated our various classes into distinct, sy, and hostile castes, are among the obvious causes which have led to this unhappy may the lesson be profitable!]

Observations on the Pestilential Cholera (Asphyxia Pestilenta), as it appeared at Sunderland in the months of November and December 1831; and on the Measures taken for its Prevention and Cure. By W. Ainsworth, Esq., M.R.C.S. 8vo. pp. 172. London, 1832. Ebers and Co.

HAVING offered the foregoing reflections to our readers, we now turn to a publication

We have not entered into the idle discussions which have arisen respecting the name of the malady; it is enough to know that a positions has, within a few weeks, which, as we intimated in our notice to correspondents last week, we consider to bear on the interesting question it discusses with uncommon ability and talent. Mr. Ainsworth is known to all who do us the honour to peruse our labours, as the writer of those letters from Sunderland which have appeared in several recent Literary Gazettes. Energetic in the pursuit of information, and well prepared by previous education and study to make the best use of what he obtained, he established for himself a very high character among the medical men whom a like desire had assembled together where this terrible disease first broke out upon our shores.* Of his experience he has here laid the results before the public; and we will only say for ourselves, that a more clear, satisfactory, and valuable statement, has not yet been submitted to our judgment. It tells us what the disease is, according to its symptoms and appearances; and it tells us how to avert, to meet, to treat, and (as far as has been ascertained) to cure it. It describes the cases which came under the author's own observation; it touches upon several of the theories to which they gave rise: and it furnishes all the intelligence for our guidance, suggested by acute remark and sound discretion, unbiassed by partial views, whether mercantile or medical.

"The history of cholera (it is said), or Asphyxia pestilenta, is that of a disease which, whether springing from the addition of new characters to a malady which has long afflicted a certain portion of the human race, or arising from new modifications established in the chemical relations of man and matter, presenting a malady sui generis, with new symptoms and new laws of propagation, has nevertheless originated under the observation of the present generation - spread rapidly over the populous country where it first made its appearancetraversed the ocean to distant countries, to the east and to the west-crossed the arid deserts of central Asia-penetrated the rocky barrier which separates that continent from Europeand reached its furthermost isles, without leaving in this progress a single breach which required filling up, to mark that its dissemination was not progressive and defined. This propagation was independent of laws which belong to astronomical science; for it followed neither the same isothermal, isotheric, or isochemenic lines; it followed no magnetic curve of similar variation or intensity; nor has there, visited many parts of the country, and swept off in an agony of a few hours about fifteen hundred human beings. Whatever it may be called, it is from this disease we would preserve the land. Again, since writing this introductory notice, we have seen a meeting advertised this very day, at Exeter Hall, for the promotion of a plan which has always had our most cordial support, vis. to extend the cottage and allotment of land system among the poorer classes. Lord Morpeth is to preside, and will no doubt have the aid of Mr. Montagu Burgoyne and other indefatigable friends of this excellent design.—Ed.

We are happy to find that Mr. A. has consequently been nominated one of the Surgeons to the district of St. George's, Hanover Square; in which four Dispensaries during its prevalence, been any eccentricities in the motions of the heavenly bodies. It was equally independent of laws which regulate the constitution and phenomena of the atmosphere; for it travelled in all seasons, and was accompanied by no change in the chemical nature of the air: it spread with, or in opposition to, the winds, and existed during the prevalence of winds from all quarters. The human constitution is rendered more suscentible by, but the pestilence has shewn itself independent of, all atmospherical influences, whether of humidity or of rarefaction. It extended its baneful influence from marshes to deserts. and from ill-ventilated towns to the hut on the mountain. Its propagation has always been independent of terrestrial influence, for it existed when the gaseous exhalations could not have been the same; on cultivated and uncultivated lands, on every variety of soil, of vegetable covering and of geognostic formation, on pasture and on forest, on sand and on rock, in cities and on the sea. But in this remarkable progress of the pestilence, from the Delta of the Ganges to the remote districts of China, the islands of Australasia, and the civilised and prosperous countries of the West, it has observed one universal law-that of following the great roads of the communication of mankind. It did not suddenly and unaccountably make its appearance at Jessore, at Timor, at Pesth, and at Sunderland : but when there was sea there was communication, and when there was land it marked its progress so distinctly, that the line of its course has been traced upon a map, as if the personification of a pestilence had been travelling over the different countries of Europe and Asia, leaving the mark of his finger behind him. It is quite another consideration, whether atmospherical vicissitudes, or disadvantages of geographical or local position, exercise any influence upon the spreading of the malady after it has once established itself in a place.

Mr. Ainsworth follows the disease to Sunderland, and reprobates the mercenary motives which caused so much mystification and misrepresentation respecting it at that place. And here we take the opportunity to observe, now that a similar state of things affects our great metropolis, that no considerations what-soever should be allowed to prevail over the infinitely important interests of humanity. We are not alarmists, but surely there is danger enough to demand the institution of every needful precaution. The population of a vast empire is concerned, and shall private speculations interfere to cause that population to be neglected; the lives of millions to be hazarded for a bale of cotton or a cask of molasses? But let wisdom, at the same time, direct these precautions: in our opinion, the alarm excited has been beyond the occasion. As yet (Thursday afternoon) we have heard there have been but four cases in Limehouse, where cholera was reported to have first shewn itself. The spot where it broke out consists of an alley leading into two courts; many of the houses are mere wood erections, and in poverty, filth, and wretchedness: the whole bears a striking resemblance to those places where the disease raged most severely in Sunderland. So late as Tuesday, when the fourth case occurred, there bad, we believe, been, beside our informant, only one medical man sent down from London to inspect the real nature of these cases; and it seems that a difference of opinion exists, sufficient, at least, to allay the terror which legislative enactments have tended to increase. We now revert to the character and symptoms of the disease as laid down by our author.

"Types of the Periods and different Stages of the Asphyxia pestilenta.

Febrile action. Termination in a short 1st Period. Oppression. Epigastric pains; evacuations; cramps. Secretions absent; Terminating 2d Period. Collapse. breath cold; sensation dull; eyes upturned.
Animal heat, the pulse and voice deficient. and voice Mild. Terminating in a short conva Terminating in a protracted convalescence, in local congestive inflammations, or in death. 8d Period. Pebrile Action The grades which result from these forms of the disease are five in number:

1. Prostration and evacuation, terminating in death.
2. The same, succeeded by a mild febrile action, inducing a rapid recovery.
3. The stage of collapse, always terminating in death.
4. A mild febrile action, terminating avocurably.
5. A severe febrile action, terminating avocurably.

We thus find, that in the early period of the disease the symptoms are few, and the results more decided; and in its more advanced stage the symptoms are more numerous, and the terminations more varied."

With regard to the mode of propagation, the definitions, &c. formerly put in the Literary Gasette are embodied in this work, and need not be repeated. The author discusses the probability of its epidemical character from three modes of origin.

"If an epidemic," he says, "it may have originated in three different ways, - let, by importation; 2dly, by the place where it made its appearance being situated in the sphere of the malignant action; and 3dly, from a sporadic origin, that is to say, it may have started up spontaneously, being connected with certain unknown terrestrial, atmospheric, or planetary influences, or with chemical changes in the relations of organic and inorganic bodies, which are detrimental to animal life."

To his admirable discussion of probabilities we can only refer, as it is too long for our page; neither can we go into the details of cases which came under his own eye. We come to certain facts.

"There are two other modes by which the disease appears to be propagated; the first by clothes, wearing apparel, &c.; and the other, a novel feature in the history of disease, by emanations from the dead. Few cases of communication by objects of dress came under my notice; but they were so striking, that they at once brought conviction of the fact to my mind. The mother of Mr. Embleton, one of the surgeons of Sunderland, whose practice lay most among the patients afflicted by the pestilential died resided in Gateshead-fell, a lofty and airy disease, took the disease and died. The wash-situation, and she insisted upon having her son's erwoman of the family was Louise Woodhall, a body brought home to the fell, in order that it

woman of forty-two years of age, who lived in | might lie in her house for the usual period prethe upper part of the town, in an airy situation. Mr. Embleton's clothes were sent to the washerwoman's; and there being much on hand at the moment, they were thrown beneath the bed occupied by herself, her husband, and a young child. The child was first attacked by the disease, and fell a victim to it. Mrs. Woodhall was taken ill on the 19th of December, and died after an illness of thirteen hours. George Woodhall was taken ill during the removal of his wife's body, though he had complained of no previous indisposition, and died after twenty-four hours' illness. The disease, it was currently believed, was taken to the poorhouse by a large easy chair, which had been provided and was used to carry patients from their homes to the hospital, and which in the evening was taken to the poorhouse. Mr. Kennedy, whose important labours on this malignant disease are so well known and so deservedly appreciated, relates a case in which the disease was first taken to Gateshead by a woman of the name of Hindmarsh, who had visited the Sandgate, the district of Newcastle where the disease prevailed most at that time, and was herself taken ill, and died the next day. Her husband left the house where she died, and was admitted, after being purified, into another lodging. His box, however, was neglected to be purified, and was placed by the side of the bed in which himself and some other inmates of the house slept. The consequences were the dissemination of the disease in the house, of which several persons were the victims. One young man went to South Shields, after being infected by the disease, and died shortly after his arrival there. The communicability of the disorder from connexion with the dead is also supported by some very satisfactory proofs, but does not admit of our placing the confidence we do in the other general infectious characters of the disease, from the liability those who come into the vicinity of the dead are also in of coming in contact with the morbid effluvia of garments or other objects. It became latterly an opinion so generally received in Sunderland, that the greatest pre-cautions were enforced. Bodies were not allowed to be kept more than twelve hours; and a separate piece of ground was allotted for their reception. The funeral service was not read in the church, and the coffins were not allowed to be carried shoulder high. In Sunderland, three different under-bearers of three different diseased bodies fell victims in succession to the disease, within twelve hours after the bodies were buried; and on the 8th December, Mr. J. Browell, the master undertaker for the parish burials, fell a victim to the disease. When the first case of the malady occurred at Penshaw, the joiner of the village was employed to make the coffin, and assisted in nailing up the corpse, and he fell a victim to the disease. William Thomson, it is averred, had no communication with persons labouring under the disease, but the day before his illness had been watching the inhumation of the dead-always a source of mournful interest in a town ravaged by a pestilence. Mr. Kennedy also relates the following case of communication after death: Some time ago a woman died of cholera, in a place called Washington, about six or seven miles from Sunderland. Two men, who attended the funeral of this woman, were soon afterwards seized; one died, and the other recovered. The mother of the individual who paratory to interment. The body was accordingly brought home, and with it the clothes of the deceased. From the house which received the body, as from a focus, the disease is said to have spread to the houses in the immediate vicinity. It will be at once perceived, then, that this discussion of positive facts negatives the misrepresentations of those who are blinded by prejudice, and corrects the errors of those who have been misled in their judgment. Statements are made in opposition to the infectious nature of the disease, which are allenced by a single fact, and yet we see them daily repeated. Thus, it is asserted that the malady is only infectious while the same atmosphere which gave the person the disease remains around him. But if a person becomes infected, and travels several miles, carrying infection with him, would it be asserted that he bears the same atmosphere, like a halo, around him? It has been stated, with the same carelessness of facts, that the disease was epidemical. Was there ever a case of Asphyxia pestilenta in a dungeon or a light-house? If an epidemic influence were abroad, the chances of infection would be the same by the bedside or on the town-steeple. But were these the phenomena of the disease? The immunity of the many, which is the great consideration with Mr. Searle, Bell, Lefevre, and other observers, does not disprove the fact, though it throws light upon the characters of the pestilence, just as much as when its fury was developed in Christmas week in Gateshead. Were the causes to be sought for in the air, or in the dissipation of individuals? And is the safety of medical attendants to be explained by denying the infectious nature of the disease, or by ascertaining if they do not, by their habits of thought and regularity of life, oppose a vital energy to the poison of disease, which does not exist in those whom they see the victims of a pestilence around them? The researches of Dr. Antomarchi, and others of that character, tend to throw no light whatever on the disease; nor does it appear to me that the arguments of any man, however great the authority of his name may be, deserve the slightest attention, when he proceeds so unphilosophically to prove a question of the highest importance to science and to humanity."

The following passage is deserving of much attention.

" In this new and malignant pestilence, the functions of the organic or vegetative life are first affected, and it terminates with the sensiferous system, as in instantaneous death; the latter only ceasing in consequence of the total failure of the functions of the ganglionic system. The organic system of nerves is the first affected; the nutritive functions and circulatory system, immediately dependent upon this class of nerves, are attacked by the morbid influence which is thence communicated to the respiratory; and the mental functions remain clear and unaffected to the last. It may truly be said, in contemplating the number and the variety of organs affected in this disease, the severity and intensity of the morbid influence, and the importance of the functions implicated, that it is impossible to conceive a more powerful concurrence of causes, tending to destroy all the vital powers of the constitution, than what is to be observed in extreme cases of this pestilence :- so remarkable in its history, so curious in a physiological point of view, and so eminently fatal to mankind."

We next quote Mr. Ainsworth's view of the best mode of encountering the disorder.

"It may seem that some of the symptoms hardly morit the importance which I have attached to them. They are, however, only the outward signs of momentous pathological changes; and it is on this account that I have neticed them as symptoms to be treated.

The external circumstances are, situation, air, temperature, and dress. When an infectious disase visits a house, whoever is not bound by the ties of humanity or relationship to give their care to the afflicted, should remove; and when those are dead or recovered who required their attentions, whenever in their power they should get away to the country for a short time. Could I have succeeded in making some poor people follow my advice on this subject in Sunderland, I could have saved several lives. Medical men should make themselves gradually acquainted with the disease; and if, in the course of their practice, they feel unnerved they should relax for a time. The air should be renewed as often as possible, whatever is the situation of the individual. Free ventilation is as necessary to health as air itself is for the burning of a candle. The tempermure is a matter of importance: high temperatures generate moisture, which, besides that vapour must have a greater capability of retaining and transmitting noxious particles. is generally unwholesome to the human frame. Heat relaxes the solids; and though the body should be kept warm, artificial means of producing that warmth should be as seldom resorted to as possible. Cold to a healthy person is always bracing, and hence the superiority of northern nations. It would be curious to see a vigorous sportsman, who does not resort to drams, attacked by the cholera! Great cold is hurtful, but that probably to a very slight degree, unless extreme, or combined with wet. Dress must always be attended to; a flannel belt should be worn in the day-time round the waist, covering the pit of the sto-mach and part of the belly. It should be abandoned at night-time, on account of the debilitating effects of copious perspiration. It METEOROLOGY, or the science of the phe-rience, that these phenomena, tempesta, winds, will be a great act of charity to furnish flannel nomena of the stmosphere, campot but be per-earthquakes, positionces, proceed almost regu-for children. The internal relations of man or woman to disease are mental and hodily. We cannot provide against depression of spirits or grief; but I could point out many cases where a cheerful devotion to a dangerous duty-where the exercise of the higher feelings of benevolence and humanity - and where, in another class, the determined energy and activity of thought necessary to combat a malignant pestilence, have, by the influence of the mind on the body, more effectually shielded individuals from morbid influences, than the most cautious preparations to avoid their proximity or annihilate their poisonous action. Bodily and mental exertion are both useful, - they engage the mind, they invigorate the body, and engender health, bringing with them a light heart and gay disposition. Eating, at least the quantity, or mode, or nature, should never be thought about; the very consideration whether such and such a thing will disagree with us, breeds malaise and indigestion. Care should be taken not to load the stomach with crudities; but when should not that care be taken? I am now writing for people supposed to possess some judgment. I had no idea that some persons swallow, like carnivorous animals, pieces of meat two or three inches in length; I would therefore have all servants quietly recommended to chew their food. In reading books on cholera, study the results, but do not peruse the cases from the mere interest which they excite. The enervating influence of the passions -

Quicquid agunt homines, votum, timor, ira, voluptusmust more especially be avoided. Let those whose energies are blunted by dissipation, be roused, by the arrival of a pestilence, to the sense of ther own prostrate weakness and corrupted degradation. I need not say any thing about drunkenness, as none addicted to that vice have patience to obtain information by the slow process of reading. I am almost ashamed of humanity when I think that this postilence appears as a denunciation against the class of spirit-drinkers, affecting others only from its infectious characters; but to one sober person nearly five intemperate are attacked; and to one death of the former there will be ten of the latter. The quantity of vitality does not appear to bear any relation in individuals to bulk, to strength, or to constitution; that is to say, to the resources against disease. Unpleasant comparisons between persons are not founded in nature: the young infant, exotic child, and sensitive female, are upon a par with themselves, and with the feeble, the studious, or the strong, as long as circumstances are the same: but the chances of their recovery are different."

With this we take our leave of a very able production, which we earnestly recommend to the faculty, to persons in authority, and to the public at large. We now proceed to shew something of the German school of thought upon this engrossing question: the first is a curious investigation of the relations of the disease to electricity and other agents in terrestrial phenomena, with certain astronomical concomitants.

Die grossen und merkwürdigen kosmisch-tellurischen Erseheinungen im Luftkreise unsrer Erde, &c. — The great and remarkable Cosmo-Telleric Phenomena in the Atmosphere of our Earth, considered in reference to the Oriental Cholera. By Dr. Ernest Nolt.

petticoats to poor females, and provide blankets | ticularly important to us at a time when the signs of the heavens assume a more and more threatening aspect. It is, indeed, surprising, that no natural philosopher has yet thought of collecting those scattered facts, and tracing them to their common source. The cholera itself has evidently a meteorological side; but this has not yet been duly considered. Even with respect to its cure, conclusions might be drawn from its meteorological appearance, in as far as the peculiar matter of the contagion could be ascertained. People have suggested the idea of a disease of the whole atmosphere, and of the earth itself, one symptom of which s the cholera; but they have not investigated the subject any further. It would, neverthen less, be highly important to inquire from what quarter the evil comes, and in what it really consists; which of the organs of the earth (if I may use that expression) is affected. On the one hand, it seems as if the matter of the disease issued from the interior of the earth. The new volcano near Sicily, and the extraordinary warmth of the Baltic Sea, evidently indicate revolutions in the interior of the earth. On the other hand, higher astral powers appear to be operating in the upper regions of the air. The unusual redness of the sky after sunset. improperly called zodiacal light, followed so late after the actual setting of the sun, on every one of the six evenings that it was observed by the writer, that it must necessarily have belonged to a very elevated region of the atmosphere. The circumstance, also, that the apparent centre of this red arc did not fall upon the point where the sun had set, but upon a point between the latter and the north pole, seems to indicate an astronomical relation in this phenomenon. If it be true, as the newspapers have asserted, that a new species of insect has been discovered in a piece of meat carried up in an air-balloon; and that, according to other observations, an extraordinary warmth has been ascertained to pervade the upper air; all these things would indicate an excitement of the atmosphere from above. Perhaps, indeed, there may be a double excitement from the atmosphere and from the earth, corresponding and mutually feeding each other, like positive and negative electricity. Will the order of nature, thus deranged, recover itself? or will a catastrophe ensue? Should the latter be the case, it would certainly be but partial; for, were it even to rain fire from heaven. I would protest in the midst of it against the total destruction of the earth, though the clock at Leipzig has struck thirteen (which, according to an old saying, is an infallible sign of the end of the world), and though the devout in Germany have fixed upon the year 1836 as the period of this consummation. In spite, however, of this prediction, the Sibyl of Time will continue to weave at her loom the web of history; and she will not cut the threads till she has finished her work.

Dr. Nolt perfectly coincides in the hypothesis here advanced, that the cholera, as well as the other natural phenomena of late years, proceeds from a derangement of the equilibrium of the electricity of the atmosphere and of the earth. He then lays down the principle, that the electricity in the air is the chief cause of thunderstorms, rain, and tempests; while that in the interior of the earth produces earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, damps, epidemic diseases, &c. He further maintains, that these twofold electrical phenomena alternate periodically with each other; and, lastly, he proves from expe-west, and that, consequently, the earth has an counteracting force sustained a loss in its mateelectric meridian in that direction. How it happens that such considerable changes take place in the electrical phenomena, the author does not venture definitively to decide; but he thinks that he has good ground for presuming that they are more or less influenced by the appearance of comets. Of the electrical nature of comets no doubt is any longer entertained : it is, therefore, probable, that they operate also on the electricity of the earth, and a variety of observations seem to support this conjecture.

With the great comet of 1811 commenced a series of electrical phenomena, which are not yet finished. At first the comet seemed to have imparted a considerable preponderance to the electricity of the air, till at length the poles shifted, and the electricity of the earth operated a violent and still continuing reaction. Immediately after the appearance of the comet in question followed wet years, with a great deal of thunder, wind, and rain. The same observation was made in the years subsequent to the appearance of the comet of 1769. The extreme of this wet period happened in that season of scarcity, 1816-1817; just at which time, as it is well known, the cholera broke out in India. Violent thunder-storms, and long-continued rains, prevailed alternately till 1823; but so early as 1820 a series of similar phenomena, which attest the reaction of the telluric against the atmospheric powers, commenced with the great earthquake in Zante. Tempests have since been more rare; but earthquakes, those internal tempests which had long been suspended, again resumed the ascendency, and manifested themselves with particularly destructive energy in Murcia, in 1829. The volcanoes, too, again fell to work afresh; and in 1831, a new volcano was formed in the Mediterranean, not far from Sicily. The torrents of rain which had heretofore prevailed, now decreased; and the water, which had previously poured down from the heavens, gushed from the earth in the great inundations of 1824, which, as well as the subsequent floods caused by tempests, were attended with various electrical phenomena, and with a peculiar disposition of the atmosphere. The author has, with great industry, collected all these, and many minor phenomena connected with them, which occurred during the abovementioned years, and among which, besides the great number of single shocks of earthquakes, the dry fogs deserve particular mention. We regret that, from the period at which his work was published, Dr. Nolt was prevented from extending his observations to the very important phenomena of later occurrence, such as the higher temperature of the Baltic, the mortality of the fish, and especially the remarkable evening lights. He merely makes mention of the great aurora borealis of the 7th of January 1831, and thence takes occasion to adduce evidence in favour of the electric nature of the northern lights. That the unusual evening lights of last autumn were of a similar nature cannot be doubted.

" Though we may have convinced ourselves that in the recent great revolutions of nature electricity has acted the principal part, still we should be puzzled to tell from what cause this activity of the electricity is of so long duration; and it would be a problem equally difficult of solution, to ascertain the dormant or suppressed activity of a power opposed to electricity and restraining it, in our solar planetary system, as well as to produce proofs of its impotence to counteract the superior force of electricity. Has been more repelled into the interior of the larly in a direction from south-east and north-lits material fundamental principle? or has the rial fundamental principle, and is its activity consequently diminished? These are questions the solution of which must rest on very unsafe conjectures and hypotheses. Has the magnetism of the earth-the more than probable counteracting power to electricity-become weaker, or its meridian taken a different direction? and where are we to seek the causes of such a change, in or out of the atmosphere, and in the body of the earth itself? The human mind is too feeble to solve this great riddle of nature in a satisfactory manner: it is only given to us to discover results, not to fathom causes."

The conjectures of the author are chiefly directed to the comets: ... "Assuming that the matter and nature of comets is electric, that those meteors are attracted by the sun, and that they are fed from this their electric source; it is not absolutely impossible that the approach of so mighty a solar electrophorus or condenser -if one may hazard such an hypothesis-might produce, chiefly by means of the matter of its tail, an extraordinary effect on the external and internal nature of the approached planetary body of some one of the solar systems, and thus, by means of an accession to the electric principle, produce a mutual reaction, which, for an indefinitely longer or shorter period, might occasion a modified activity of such natural powers as are affected by electricity in the electrically impregnated planet. May we not, then, venture to assume, that some consideration should be paid to the proved approximation of the comet of 1811 to our earth, especially in the month of October, in an investigation of the physical causes and their laws, which have been so active and influential on the extraordinary state of the weather in late years, so productive of great revolutions of nature? It cannot possibly be regarded as a mere sport of chance-no where in nature is there such a thing as chance, but all is fixed and governed by immutable laws-that electricity should so long play its important and extraordinary part every where and in every season, as well as amidst all possible phenomena, both in the atmosphere and in the interior of the earth, in organic and inorganic nature. Had not perhaps the comet of 1769 a similar probable influence on the weather of the succeeding years, which were also remarkable for wet and the failure of crops? Have not comets been frequently observed of late years by astronomers, though not indeed in the neighbourhood of our earth, which comets may possibly be entering into a certain electrical connexion with our sun? Is not the preponderating activity of the electricity of our earth and its atmosphere the cause that, for a long series of years, the aurora borealis has not been at all, or but very rarely, observed? If the experiments and observations of Arago at Paris, of Dalton at Manchester, and of Kupfer at Kasan, render it probable that the phenomenon of the aurora borealis is more closely connected with the magnetism than with the electricity of the earth, since these philosophers remarked, during the continuance of the northern light, even when it was observed at the greatest distance, and when not visible at the place of observation, a variation and disturbance in the course of the magnetic needle, and thence assumed the magnetic nature of the polar light - may we not thence infer that, by means of the preponderating activity of the electricity, the magnetism of the earth has for a period of almost thirty years? The recent reappearance of the northern lights seems to announce an approaching atmospheric change, which may take place sooner or later.

With immediate reference to cholers the author thus expresses himself : - " It is more than probable that, in regard to cholera, we ought to assume a certain acidifying basis in the imponderable principles of the air, which is far from having been detected by any eudio-metric test, and which it is perhaps impossible to detect. The disease, however, is not to be deduced from a certain specific exhalation, which may be supposed to float about in the air, as is the case in yellow fever, the plague, and marshfevers. These foreign matters, namely, possess the property of floating in the air merely as heterogeneous particles, like smoke, and of being carried only to indefinite distances from the place where they were generated, without infecting the internal mass of air. These constituent parts also differ from the atmospheric principle of the cholera in this, that, on the one hand, they disperse themselves eccentrically in the air in all directions, and on the other hand invariably follow the current of the air, till, at certain distances from the place of exhalation, they cease to be morbific. Now, this is not the case with the cholera; for, though it certainly pursues, more or less, a certain meridian direction, namely, that of the presumptive electric meridian from S.E. to N.W., but not the accidental currents of different winds, yet it sometimes shapes its course directly contrary to that of the wind, or back-ward from N.W. to S.E., and after a while again returns to its original direction from S.E. to N.W. Not only this progressive advance in the direction of the presumptive electric meridian renders it highly probable that the exciting atmospheric principle of the Asiatic cholera has some causal connexion with the internal state of the atmosphero-telluric electricity; but it has been further observed, that when the disease raged with the greatest fury in its original Asiatic native land, earthquakes, and other extraordinary phenomena of the telluric electricity were frequent. Thus, in 1824, the disease prevailed in Java simultaneously with volcanic eruptions; a crater is said to have opened in the Himalaya mountains; and Shiraz was destroyed by an earthquake. It was a remarkable fact, that in the spring of the same year fifteen-sixteenths of the dogs in the town of Chakolly, in the peninsula of Hindoostan, died before the breaking out of the disease.'

Might it not be advisable to try the effect of electricity in cases of cholera, and thus to attempt to counteract by artificial electricity the derangement occasioned by the natural?

Our next German author investigates more systematically the telluric origin ascribed to cholera; which is indeed remarkably strengthened by the fact, that whenever bodies of troops were moved in India, however healthy for months or years before, they were invariably attacked with cholers on their march. In one case mentioned to us, out of some 5,000 persons previously in perfect health, more than one-fourth perished in a fortnight ere they could reach the summit of a ghaut.

WE deem it both useful and interesting to lay the electrical power received any accession to earth, so as to manifest itself with less energy before the British public some of the views of a physician who has made the natural history of | cholera we may even deduce inferences à pos- | thing more, and which, on this account, we do diseases the study of his life, on a subject that is daily becoming of more and more importance to ourselves.

Whether the greater probability should ultimately decide in favour of the telluric origin of the cholera, and that it belongs to the class of diseases which originate in malaria, or that it is the highest degrée of a morbific principle which has been reserved for our time, and which affords evidence of an extraordinary telluric period, still it is worthy of serious consideration that the disease broke out in the year 1817 precisely in such districts as are particularly favourable to the generation of intermittent fevers; where, moreover, in these fevers the British physicians not rarely observed the same sudden prostration of strength as in the cholera, and where, in certain spots, as in par-ticular districts of Malva and Chittagong, this disease, as the most aggravated form of those fevers, had previously been endemic. It is afterwards shewn how the disease appeared upon a superficies on which at the same time earthquakes were unusually frequent and destructive ... in the islands of Java and Banda, in the province of Cutch, in the northern part of Hindoostan, and throughout almost the whole range of the Himalaya mountains; again in the north-western part of Hindoostan; further, in the Celebes, in the Mauritius, on the coasts of Syria, and subsequently in Persia. To this enumeration it may be added, that the provinces of China, in which the disease proved particularly destructive, were visited last year (1830) by earthquakes, accompanied with three days' hail and floods of rain; that on the 4th of December earthquakes were felt on the Black Sea, especially in the island of Taman, and Vesuvius and Ætna exhibited in their activity evidence of volcanic excitement. It is true, however, that in the direction which the disease has recently taken, no earthquakes have been perceived. Undeniable as it is that earthquakes do not extend themselves in straight lines; that they always take place simultaneously with changes in the atmosphere; that they exercise not merely a transient but even a permanent influence on man and beast, - as, for example, on the west coast of America, after single earthquakes certain species of grain would no longer grow,-and the nature of the soil in general powerfully affects life in all its forms: still we shall here direct attention to this point only, that the cholera has hitherto propagated itself in a most extraordinary and inexplicable manner, sometimes overleaping the nearest place and breaking out in one further distant, and following in general the channels of human intercourse much less than the natural qualities of the soil, its systems of rivers, and waterdivisions, in such a manner as that, having once arrived at a river, it chiefly manifests itself, like earthquake, at its source and at its mouth, till it gradually occupies its whole length, is stationary in its progress for some time, and then all at once conducted forward by rivers and seas, as liquid masses, gains new ground again. From the manner of its spreading along the salt-lakes of Astrachan, and the salt-marshes in the Marmaros, and its appearance at Bochnia and Wieliczka, this quality of soil seems to have a peculiar influence upon its propagation. On casting a look at the map which accompanies Dr. Schnurrer's work, it will be seen that so closely does the disease follow in its progress the lines of the rivers, that in Persia it runs for a considerable space and now scarcely ever occurs in either, were along what is presumed to have been formerly and are disorders which in a short time spread in infected towns, the prisons, convents, and the bed of a river; so that from the presence of very far, of which we soon cease to hear any such like sequestered edifices, have remained teriori of the existence of rivers. If, now, we observe how the disease travels through the East Indian Archipelago, along the Persian Gulf, the Lake Aral, the Caspian and the Black Seas, the Baltic Sea, quite to Archangel, and the great lakes of Finland, but stops at the Mediterranean, we shall see that it covers a considerable portion of an arc of more than 50 degrees in breadth, which surrounds the earth somewhat like Saturn's ring, and which certainly does not tend to diminish the plausibility of the notion that the disease is of telluric origin.

If we come to inquire what is the external cause of the disease, we are authorised to assume that it proceeds from a cause diffused over the whole earth, since it manifests itself with the same intensity and the same danger in individual cases, contrary to the manner of all other epidemic disorders, in the Spice Islands as on the Upper Wolga, and in the extremes of the south and the north. If the causes lay in the climate or in a contagion, the cases would be modified, partly by diversity of external influences, partly by different states of the subjects attacked by it; or the disease, were it not susceptible of any modification, would ultimately cease to spread. But, as the disorder is so peculiar in this respect, and not to be compared with any other, excepting, perhaps, the influenza, the cause of it is only to be sought in the atmosphere, or in the earth.

It was early observed in India that the cholera in its course obviously passed by certain places, but visited them after a while with so much the more severity; and further, that, where the disease prevailed, even those who were not actually attacked by it, felt more or less indisposed. The same observation was made at Moscow, as we are assured by Loder and Barchewitz, and likewise at Warsaw, where, during the prevalence of the epidemic, many thousands complained of a peculiar pain in the calf of the leg. Lastly, it was found that wherever the cholera appeared, it so far established itself for the succeeding years as to return annually at a particular season of the year; but that invariably, at its first visit, it observed a certain time of increase and decrease, whether police regulations were adopted or not. These reasons could not fail to overthrow the belief in the infectious nature of the disease wherever it made its appearance; and accordingly not only by far the greater number of persons, but among them such as proved themselves to be the acutest observers, decided against its diffusion by infection.

It would be inconceivable how the belief in infection could so universally prevail in Europe, before the arrival of the disease, if it were not in the nature of mankind to believe what they wish, and to overrate the resources which they possess against certain powers of nature.

The arguments adduced by the advocates of infection are: firstly, the progressive extension of the disease from country to country, eastward and westward of the Delta of the Ganges.

In the history of diseases, however, we meet with some which spread very wide at particular periods, and yet did not prove to be infectious; for instance, the influenza, the sweating-sickness, the spotted fever, in some respects also the yellow fever, nay we might also mention the cholic, which, above a century ago, was very common in Europe and the West Indies, not regard as infectious. In all these disorders, it was found that persons were not attacked by them unless they went to the countries in which they prevailed. The same is the case with the cholera. From Hindoostan, where the disease has raged ever since the year 1817. and where no measures of police were ever employed against it, the cholera has not in that period travelled to New Holland, the Cape, or Brazil: with the exception of the Mascarenhas islands, it has invariably spread in one particular direction. Respecting cholera we may further state, that it rages most violently where great numbers of persons are assembled for the purposes of trade or war. This circumstance might seem at first sight to favour the notion of infection. We are told, on the other hand, that the great mass of the people in those places scouted this notion, because they knew that in houses containing numerous inhabit-ants, only single individuals, or perhaps two or three, were attacked, much the same as in detached habitations in the fever districts of Italy and England. The assumption of the infection is therefore, to say the least of it, extremely arbitrary, and it is superfluous, inasmuch as the places where the disease raged most violently were invariably situated on coasts or on rivers; and one series of rivers after another, and in every instance those persons who dwelt or worked upon the water, were first attacked. The only logical deduction that can be made from the above facts is, that the external cause of the cholera is a telluric cause, which is propagated by seas and rivers, not because they are channels of communication, but inasmuch as, being liquid masses, they form a particular kind of conductors. Had it depended on human communication alone, the cholera might have spread so far back as 1823 from Syria over the Mediterranean Sea.

A second circumstance that seems to favour the notion of the contagious nature of the disease is, that, when in its progress the cholera breaks out at a place, the total number of the persons whom it attacks are not affected at once, as one might expect upon the supposition of a telluric cause, but individuals, and gradually more and more, are seized, till the number has attained a certain height, and then begins to decrease. This phenomenon, however, depends chiefly on the degree of disposition, which is not the same in all, and sometimes is only gradually attained. Certain facts stated in the newspapers, if their accuracy may be relied on, prove at farthest that the disease may be brought from a place where it already prevails, by a person who exposes himself to the morbific influences, just as one may receive a favourable or pernicious influence by change of abode, and fall sick on his return; or they prove also in some cases that, when a place is situated in the tract over which the disease spreads itself, the person who returns from another place where it already prevails and is first affected by it, seems to propagate the disorder, which would have broken out without him. In order really to prove infection, it ought to be shewn that, in places lying beyond the sphere of the disease, on the arrival of a person affected by it, those who first came in contact with him fell sick, and that none was attacked by the disorder excepting those who had some kind of intercourse with the patient: that further, absolute seclusion and isolation are a protection against the disease; and lastly, that exempt from it. Not only can nothing of this | panic among the inhabitants, and thousands kind be proved, but many instances might be adduced in contradiction to the assertion of Scott, that the cholera was never communicated by ships: one, however, shall suffice. According to the report of Admiral Timofevent, dated Sebastopol the 10th of December, the disease broke out among the crew of several ships, and even on hoard one which had lain twenty-one days in the road under surveillance. On the coasts of Livonia, during the prevalence of the cholera, a great mortality took place among the fish, and patches of the strand were covered with them, just as in India certain species of reeds were observed to die away on the borders of the rivers and lakes to which the cholera extended. In individual places, moreover, as in Moscow for example, the evidence of non-contagion amounts to demonstration: or in Danzig, where the first ship from Russia did not arrive till the day after the appearance of the disorder; or in Riga, where the tale of the opening of a bale of cotton was speedily contradicted, and the physicians unanimously declared the malady to be not infectious.

If physicians assert that the disease, though originally not infectious, may become so in process of time through the great number of the sick, they may be met with the simple fact. that wherever cholera hospitals have been selected with any judgment, the mortality in them has hitherto been relatively less than in private houses, though none but the worst cases were treated in the former, and the very removal of the patients was liable to operate prejudicially. To the physicians and attendants the service of these hospitals was no where so dangerous as that of hospitals for the reception of typhus patients.

After the disease had kept advancing from one coast and one series of rivers to another. not so destructively as the plague or the yellow fever, but carrying off its victims in spite of all the efforts of art, and had planted itself on the frontiers of Europe, it might be assumed with certainty that it was not given to human power to stop its ravages. For though no attempts had yet been made to oppose it by artificial cordons and quarantine regulations, still the disease met in its progress with far more ef-fective natural barriers; and in the long journevs of caravans there was observed a much stricter quarantine than any that can be enforced by military agents. Dr. Lang, for instance, relates that he marched with a detachment of marine troops from the Caspian Ses for Archangel, and on the third day after their departure from Sebastopol the cholera made its appearance, but after it had carried off three victims, it again subsided: this detachment therefore, in its march to Archangel, which lasted six months, observed a quarantine with which no fault can be found, and yet the disease afterwards broke out at Archangel in a very destructive form. If you ask what benefit has hitherto been derived from cordons and quarantines, you are referred to Simbirsk and Sarepta, where the attempts to exclude the disease are said to have been successful, whilst the most powerful means and the most energetic efforts proved incapable in a thinly peopled empire to exempt Moscow and Petersburg from its ravages; which sufficiently demonstrates that cordons and seclusion in general are of no avail, or at least that they failed to accomplish the desired object. It is even asserted by Drs. Darbel and Lassis, that it was not till the formation of the cordon round Moscow that the disease first broke out, because this measure, and the privations which it occasioned spread a lated. In like manner, different kinds of em-without a livelihood were consigned to despair. In the manifesto of the Emperor of Russia. dated the 28th of January, it is expressly said that the effects of the disease were particularly destructive among those troops which were emtion. In Prussia, in like manner, the corden sanitaire was driven back from one series of rivers to another, and in Hungary and Gallicia, the measures long ago pursued against the plague have never been of any avail. Though a twelvemonth since there seemed to be reas to prognosticate that this universal malady would manifest itself in its worst shape in camps and in towns oppressed by the horrors of war, this prediction was by no means fulfilled. According to frequently repeated assurances. it did indeed always make its appearance afresh after every battle between the Poles and the Russians; but following its own laws, it was neither more destructive nor did it rage longer in its worst form, in countries where war had accumulated all its hardships and privations. and where it acted very differently from the war-pestilence, which is purely the offspring of want and misery. On the other hand, in places where we should have expected, from the blessings of civilisation and wealth, a mitigation of the evil, there terror and the rigour of precautionary measures produced such distress, that it was asserted that the years of invasion and inundation, though they certainly cost more lives, were less terrible than the horrors which attended this disease. The advocates of infection, nevertheless, agree that individual disposition has a larger share in generating the disorder than intercourse with the diseased. If, therefore, governments should think of taking measures to counteract the cholera as an enidemic, not as an individual disease, to diminish the number of persons disposed to it, and thus to mitigate the violence of its attack, their first object should be so to operate upon the disposition, that the principle of the disease, if in its irresistible progress it should in time reach us, might meet with as few predisposed individuals as possible.

As it has been found from universal experience, that indigent, ill-fed, and ill-lodged individuals; further, such whose occupations oblige them to work upon the water; and lastly, those who during the prevalence of the disease have to undergo great fatigue, are most exposed to the attack of the cholera, - particular regard should be had to these classes of persons, and if their situation and engagements forbid their being withdrawn from them, they should be furnished with such resources as protect them from the morbific influence. Good warm clothing, especially flannel under-garments, and a sufficiency of them for changing when wet through; but above all, provisions of a wholesome quality, the distribution of carefully cooked warm food, such as Rumford soup, particular attention to the quality of beer and salt, and to the cleanliness of habitations by the removal of dung-heaps, stagnant water, and mud from cellars which have been overflowed in consequence of inundations, translocation from notoriously unhealthy dwellings, shutting up the latter, especially in the case of schools and prisons, are as necessary as minute attention to such unfortunate families for whom there is not time to procure another residence. These families have the more need of wholesome food and warm clothing, that they may be obliged to stay as little as possible at home, and their dwellings may be so much the better ventiployments and occupations are liable to pro a disposition to the disease. Upon the whole whatever induces great exhaustiheats and colds, or brings individuals near rivers and waters, deserves particular regard.

With respect to the sick themselves, the experience of every country which has yet been visited by the disease, teaches us that any attentions may be paid them without danger. Hospitals for the reception of patients should be in healthy dry situations, not too far from the other dwellings, because the being conveyed a considerable distance, and the taking of the least cold, are liable to aggravate the disease. Let the dead be buried decently, but as simply as possible, that the spirits of those who attend them may not be teo deeply affected; perhaps, indeed, this disorder may produce a permanent simplification of funerals in points in which it must be desirable, as it certainly will leave behind it many a change in manners and customs. Upon the whole, let people amuse themselves, not by the pleasures of the table, or boisterous mirth, but by active efforts in behalf of science and the welfare of mankind-let those for whom such pursuits are toe grave, think of Boccaccio, and expatiate in the field of imagination: but let none forget, that at no time does selfishness bring with it more immediate punishment; and that those who think only of secluding themselves are the most liable to be attacked. As there is no evidence whatever that the disease is communicable by commedities, let no restrictions be laid unon commerce : and let it be the especial study of governments to employ all hands as much as possible. But whoever cannot overcome his apprehensions, let him remove—neither ferward nor backward, for where the cholera has once been it is likely to appear again in succeeding vears but out of the track of the disease; let him migrate to Italy, or to the hospice of the St. Gothard. Let Colleges of Physicians and Boards of Health take a lesson from the account given by Villalba, of the first appearance of the venereal disease, which spread similar consternation. When, in 1493, this previously unknown disease appeared at Seville, the king and queen, Ferdinand and Isabella, ordered their physicians to attend the persons afflicted with it in the hospital of San Salvador. Many physicians and professors laboured for seven or eight months, applying thousands of remedies without benefit. The famous physician Masstro Francisco de Gibralion, and the celebrated Drs. Bedega, Aragones, and Infantes, beld councils, the result of which was a declaration, that the disease was a scourge of Heaven, which attacked alike all ages and complexions, cities and villages, and that all physical remedies had till then proved inefficacious; they were therefore of opinion, that every one who had greater experience should be allowed to undertake the cure of the disorder; and prayed the king to permit non-graduates to try their skill upon it. The consequence was, that a weaver actually cured most of the patients with a sort of ointment.

Having devoted so much of our space to one subject, which can only be excused by its absorbing interest and vital importance, we shall conclude as briefly as possible, but still having great objects to recommend and enforce.

1. Besides the hospitals, infirmaries, dispensaries, and receiving-houses, already a pointed, or in process of being so, we would strongly urge the necessity of temperary weeden erections in airy situations; such, for example, as officers have in camps, or such as may be seen where the whale is exhibited at Charing Cross. These would have the advantage of a choice of locality, and thus remove the infected from the denser abodes of men, where they could be equally well attended to, and with a better chance of cure.

2. The general establishment of soup kitchens, where the poor might have a quart of nourishing food for one penny; or if unable to pay that sam, gratuitously.

3. A most efficient remedial, or rather preventive measure, would be the distribution of cast clothes among the indigent, who are so ill protected from the inclemency of the season. Few persons in middle or upper life but who have garments lying by them which they are never likely to wear again. These made up for the poor, and judiciously given, would be among the greatest of comforts at this trying period.

4. Cleanliness is certainly to be observed but, after all, dirt does not appear to be much connected with the disease. Warmth and nourishment, and the avoiding of wet, are far more essential, and ought to be carefully looked to-

5. Apothecaries' shops appointed as dispensaries should be distinguished by some obvious and appropriate sign; so that in case of any deranged state of the bowels, the poor might know at once whither to run for medicine; as much depends upon its speedy exhibition.

6. There are a train of symptoms engendered by fear, approximating closely to the preliminary symptoms of cholera: this may almost be called cholera-phobia; and to diminish the alarm thus occasioned, we would anxiously lift a warning voice to re-assure the timid, and tell them they are not in the alightest danger.

Adventures of a Younger Son. 3 vols. 12mo London, 1832. Colburn and Bentley.

A WILD, spirited, and original work, written as only an eye-witness can write of scenes he has actually witnessed. Violent, full of prejudices, which make the page more characteristic, these volumes remind us of some of the old travellers, urged on by the most reckless spirit of adventure. There is occasional force of expression, which had better have been omitted; but, as a whole, this is an extremely attractive dramatic and graphic maritime romance. This Younger Son is one of those sufferers from that parental tyranny, at once so rare and so bitter. A naturally violent spirit is infuriated almost to madness by oppressiona picture true enough to nature and at an early age he commences a lawless career as a " saltwater thief," according to Shakespeare; or one who, according to Byron, holds that

" My tent on shore, my galley on the sea, Are more than cities and serais to me."

And who asks, concerning a ship, Who would not brave the battle, fire, and wreck, To move the monarch of her peopled deck?"

A chance extract or two will give the best idea of the author's powers. The following is a spirited sea-piece.

"One night, off Madeira, it was blowing hard, when a man called out, 'A strange sail on the weather bow!' I was standing very near him, and answered, 'Very well, I'll report it;' though I saw nothing but what seemed a great black cloud, and proceeded aft to acquaint the first officer with it, who had charge of the watch. I beheld him asleep on the carronade slide; a new feeling awoke in my bosom,-revenge! 'What,' I asked, 'did you stab the fellow, and throw his carcass overboard?' 'Oh,

I left him asleep, and went down to the captain, whom I awoke with,- 'There is a large ship just under our lee-bow!' He started up, saying, 'Where is the officer of the watch? 'I cannot find him, sir.' 'Not find him?' and up rushed the captain. The officer was sleeping close to the companion ladder; so that, on the captain's putting his foot on the deck. he stood before him, and called out his name The affrighted sleeper sprung up at the wellknown voice of his stern commander. there was no time to waste in words; it was blowing a hard gale, and the sea running high; the dark and moving mass which, an instant before, I had thought a cloud or land, now in the form of an immense ship dismasted, came driving towards us. Our captain roared out to put the helm down, and turn the hands up; but it seemed too late. A voice, trying to make itself heard through a trumpet, hailed us as from a tower, for so she loomed, as she drifted before the wind, borne on by a gigantic sea, which lifted her above us. The blue lights burning on her forecastle were reflected on our close-reefed topsail. It appeared inevitable that, as she replunged in the deep trough of the sea, in which we lay becalmed by her monstrous hull, we should be crushed, or cut in two. Our sails struck against the masts with a thundering sound; and the crew, scrambling up the batchways in their shirts, but half awake, involuntarily screamed at the sight of the immense ship coming upon us. Panicstruck, we could do nothing; and she, impelled by the fury of the sea and winds, was borne on, rolling and plunging, without sail or most to steer or steady her. It was a scene that appalled the most hardy; some held out their arms widely. and shricked; others fell on their knees; and more threw themselves headlong down the hatchways: and though it was but a moment, such a moment makes a boy an old man. A loud and more distinctly heard voice, speaking through a trumpet, again hailed us, -it seemed our death summons,- Starboard your helm, or we shall run you down!' As the wave was lifting us up, the stranger struck us. There was a frightful crash. Then I heard the loud shrieks of our men, and, giving myself up for lost, convulsively griped hold of the shrouds, and awaited my fate. My eyes were rivetted on the stranger; she passed, as I thought, over us, and then lay, like a gigantic rock, immovable, close on our lee-quarter. The gale, unimpeded, again roared among our shrouds, and the sea broke over us. After a horrible pause, the bustle and the noise of the winds, waves and voices, recalled me to my senses. The stranger had struck us on our quarter, and carried away our quarter-gallery, stern-boat, and main-boom; nothing more, and we were safe. The ship again hailed us, and asked our name. She then ordered us to keep close to her during the night, and added that she was his Britannic Majesty's ship, Victory. That night nothing was said to the first officer; but he was put under close arrest. Indeed the panic was so great, that for a long time every one seemed under a spell, and our captain and officers were only recalled to their duty by the frequent night-signals from the Victory, with the roar of her immense guns to enforce attention to them, and to keep us in our station on our lee-quarter; for they feared we should give them the slip during the night. In the morning, when I went on deck, I found we had lost our convoy; and the Victory, still close to us, was making signals for we veered an empty cask astern, with a rope attached to it, for her to take on board. This done, she fastened halsers, as big as our cables, to the rope; and we hauled them on board over the taffrail, secured them to our mainmast, made all the sail we could carry, and bere up for the island of Madeira. Our situation was most perilous; for, notwithstanding the great length of the halsers by which we were towing, the weight and size of the Victory, then the largest ship in the world, gave us dreadful shocks as we lifted up trembling on the crest of a wave, and she sank beneath us in its hollow,—she seemed dragging us stern foremeet downward; then again, when we laboared, becalmed in the deep trough, and she was lifted up, she appeared plunging down directly on us. Sometimes the tow-ropes, though nearly the size of my body, snapped like rotten twine, and we had again the difficult and dangerous task of getting her tow-ropes on board. Luckily that night the wind abated, or, I think, we should both have foundered. The strain on our ship was so great, that besides the danger of carrying away our main-mast, the seams of our deck opened, and the sea broke over us, sweeping away all before it, and threatened destruction by filling us with water. Our captain hailed the Victory, and represented our danger: the only reply was, 'If you cast off the tew-rope, we will sink you.' On board the Victory they had eased her by throwing overboard the guns on her upper dack, setting storm-sails on the stumps of her lower masts, and by every means in their power. The next day, the gale was considerably abated, though the sea was still heavy. We brought to a large West India ship bound to Madeira, and she was compelled to take our place. Our captain then went on board the late admiral's ship, when her commander, after reprimanding him for his bad look-out during the night, said he should pass over his conduct in consideration of the service he had done in having been the means of saving to his majesty and his country the most valuable of their ships that bore the triumphant flag of Nelson, and that was then bearing his bedy."

As a contrast, we will introduce the Arabian heroine to our readers: we should premise that the here has saved her life, and that her dying father gave her to his charge.

"The cabin-door was opened by a little Ma-layan slave girl, from the coast of Malabar, whom I had sent as my first gift, and I entered. The lady-mine was seated cross-legged on a low couch, so shrouded and enveloped in white drapery, the mourning of her country, that I could distinguish nothing of those wondrous beauties the old Arab woman had talked of. On my entrance I thought her one of those marble figures I had heard of in Egyptian temples; but I found she was alive. Her feet were bare; she rose and placed them in embroidered slippers, which lay on the deck of the cabin; she took my hand, put it to her forehead, then to her lips: I entreated her to be seated. She resumed her position, and remained motionless, her arms drooping listlessly down; her little rosy feet nestled under her, like tiny birds under the mether's wing. Her hair, the only part now visible, covered her like a jet black cloud. I had felt the pressure of her tremulous lips; and imagination, or perhaps some faint outline which fancy had left graved on my hand, pictured her mouth exquisitely soft and small—(I loathe a large and hard one); and I think now, this silent pressure wove the no; it was but a boyish spite; ... if I were to us to take her in tow. Far this purpose, as first link of that diamond chain which time nor meet him now, perhaps I might do as you say. Shene was more swell than a boat could live in, use could ever break or wear away. I seemed entranced. We both sat silent; and I felt it a relief when the old Arab woman returned with coffee, and mangastene, and guava jelly. She again rose, which I would have prevented, but the old woman signed me to sit still. She took a minute cup, in a fillagree silver stand, and presented it to me. I was so intently gazing on her tapering, delicately formed fingers, that I upset the coffee, and, putting the cup to my mouth, was going to swallow that - which. indeed, as it was not bigger than the spicy shell of mace that holds the nutmeg, I might have done without choking. The old woman told me afterwards this was a bad omen. She then presented the conserves, and, returning the stand to the woman, resumed her seat. Taking from my hand a ring of gold, with an Arabic inscription, and hooped with two circles of camel's hair, the same her expiring father had placed on my finger, I held it towards her. The low and suppressed means she made on my entrance broke out into sobs, so violent that I could see her loose vest agitated by the beating of her heart. I was about to remove this object, which awakened such painful remembrances, when she grasped it, pressed it to her lips, and wept over it some time. The woman then said something to her; and, without the guidance of her eyes, she again put forth her tapering little fingers, and replaced the ring. It was indeed the antique signet of her father's tribe: and, like the seal of princes, it made right wrong, or wrong right, and gave, and took away, and made and unmade laws, obeying the will of its wearer. She put it on the fore-finger of my right hand, and again pressed my hand to her head and lips. Upon this I took a ring I had selected from De Ruyter's store of baubles; it was a deep ruby, of the shape and size of a wild grape, hooped and massy with virgin gold, and, by its size, seemed to have been worn by a fairy. Gently disengaging her hand from the drapery, as it lay motionless by her side, I placed this ring on the fore-finger of her right hand. This interchange of rings was a definite acknowledgment of our union."

We believe the celebrated Trelawney to be the author of the Younger Son, and that it embodies a considerable portion of his earlier life. It has all the air of a considerable share of reality being blent with the fiction. It is just the wild and reckless journal we could suppose kept by some bold buccaneer.

Wýbor z Básnictwi Ceského-Cheskian Anthology; being a History of the Poetical Literature of Bohemia, with translated Specimens. By John Bowring. 12mo. pp. 270. London, 1832. Hunter.

This is another of those works by which Dr Bowring has done so much for the literature of his country, by introducing to it that of others. We quite agree in his belief as to the refinement and kindliness of feeling such interchange is calculated to produce. The present volume contains Bohemian poetry, of which the following are characteristic specimens :-

"O'erpowered by weariness, I slept Within the oaken grove; And near me grew, as morning woke, A rosemary-tree above.

I gathered many a rosemary-branch, And twin'd them in a wreath, And threw it in the flowing stream— The fresh cool stream beneath;

And said, ' Whoe'er this wreath shall see, And save it from the tide,
That maiden shall my mistress be,
That maiden be my bride.

And morning came, and many a maid Her pitcher went to fill:

They watch'd the verdant rosemary-wreath
That floated on the rill.

Ludmila saw the flowers, and stretch'd Her hand to grasp the wreath;
Poor dove! she fell—the stream roll'd on—
'Twas silence all, and death.

And thrice and thrice the funeral bell And thrice and thrice the substant Toll'd with a heavy tone:
And tell me, ye who know so well,
What mortal soul is gone?

It is thy maiden, 'tis thy joy;
See, 'midst that mist of gloom,
They fit her shroud—four black-rob'd men, They lower her in her tomb.

O God belov'd! and dost thou take My maiden in thy wrath!

Sweet bird of mercy! to her grave,
O, shew me now the path.

Behind that mountain, in you aisle, A choir of priests outpour

Hymns, and five paces from the church
The green-sod wraps her o'er.

Then let me mourn, and let me weep, And to her grave I'll go, And there eternal watches keep, Communing with my wo.

And then my eye shall shed dark tears, Till they are clos'd in death; And time shall hang upon my hier That fatal rosemary-wreath."

"Blade of wheat! thou golden blade, Who shall harvest thee? For my lover lingers far— Will not come to me.

Blade of wheat! thou golden blade, Who shall bind thee round? For my lover lingers far— Where shall he be found?

Mother! mother! mother mine! Changeful is my heart; Cleanse, O mother mine, away All its fickle part.

On my feet my slippers seem
Made of heavy lead;
Mother, mother, mother mine!
I would hide my head.

Nay! no angry look on thee Turn I; yet I may Mourn thou art so fickle, maid! So the people say."

" Mother! look round thee, Round thee, and see All the youths struggling, Struggling for me. Fierce is the struggle, Eager and wild: Does thy heart gladden? I am thy child!"

We regret that we have not room for "the Bell," a fine old legendary ballad. Dr. Bowring is quite a cosmopolite poet: we are glad to see he announces, in connexion with Mr. Borrow, a translation of the Songs of Scandinavia-likely, we think, to prove his most interesting and valuable work.

> A NIGHT ON THE NIGER. (From the Landers' Travels: unpublished.)

WE made no stop whatever on the river, not even at meal-times, our men suffering the canoe to glide down with the stream while they were eating their food. At five in the afternoon they all complained of fatigue, and we looked around us for a landing-place, where we might rest awhile, but we could find none, for every village which we saw after that hour was unfortunately situated behind large thick morasses and sloughy bogs, through which, after various provoking and tedious trials, we found it impossible to penetrate. We were employed three hours in the afternoon in endeavouring to find a landing at some village, and though we saw them distinctly enough from the water, we could not find a passage through the morasses, behind which they lay. Therefore we were compelled to relinquish the attempt, and continue our course on the Niger. We passed several beautiful islands in the course of the day, all cultivated and inhabited, but low and flat. The width of the river appeared to vary considerably, sometimes it seemed to be two or three miles across, and at others double that width. The current drifted us along very rapidly, and we guessed it to be running at the rate of three or four miles an hour. The direction of the stream continued nearly east. The day had been excessively warm, and the sun set in beauty and grandeur, shooting forth rays tinged with the most heavenly hues, which extended to the zenith. Nevertheless, the appearance of the firmament, all glorious as it was, betokened a coming storm; the wind whistled through the tall rushes, and darkness soon covered the earth like a veil. This rendered us more auxious than ever to land somewhere, we cared not where, and to endeavour to procure shelter for the night, if not in a village, at least under a tree. Accordingly, rallying the some other pieces, by two eminent divines, drooping spirits of our men, we encouraged educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; them to renew their exertions by setting them viz. Dr. W. S. Powell (Master of that College, the example, and our cance darted silently and swiftly down the current. We were enabled | wallowing in the river for their own amuseto steer her rightly by the vividness of the lightning, which flashed across the water continually and by this means also we could distinguish any danger before us, and avoid the numerous small islands with which the river is interspersed, and which otherwise might have embarrassed us very seriously. But though we could perceive almost close to us several lamps burning in comfortable-looking huts, and could plainly distinguish the voices of their occupants, and though we exerted all our strength to get at them, we were foiled in every attempt, by reason of the sloughs and fens, and we were at last obliged to abandon them in despair. Some of these lights, after leading us a long way. eluded our search, and vanished from our sight like an ignis fatuus, and others danced about we knew not how. But what was more vexatious than all, after we had got into an inlet, and toiled and tugged for a full half hour against the current, which in this little channel was uncommonly rapid, to approach a village from which we thought it flowed, both village and lights seemed to sink into the earth, the sound of the people's voices ceased of a sudden, and when we fancied we were actually close to the spot, we strained our eyes in vain to see a single hut, — all was gloomy, dismal, cheerless, and solitary. It seemed the work of enchantment; every thing was as visionary as 'sceptres grasped in sleep.' We had paddled along the banks a distance of not less than thirty miles, every inch of which we had attentively examined, but not a bit of dry land could any where be discovered which was firm enough to bear our weight. Therefore, we resigned ourselves to circumstances, and all of us having been re-freshed with a little cold rice and honey, and water from the stream, we permitted the canoe to drift down with the current, for our men were too much fatigued with the labours of the day to work any longer. But here a fresh evil arose which we were unprepared to meet. An incredible number of hippopotami arose very near us, and came plashing, snorting, and plunging all round the canoe, and placed us in imminent danger. Thinking to frighten them off, we fired a shot or two at them, but the noise only called up from the water and out of the fens, about as many more of their unwieldy companions, and we were more closely beset than before. Our people, who had never in all their lives been exposed in a canoe to such huge and formidable beasts, trembled with fear and apprehension, and absolutely wept aloud; and their terror was not a little increased by the dreadful peals of thunder which rattled over their heads, and by the awful darkness which prevailed, broken at intervals by flashes of lightning, whose powerful glare was truly awful. Our people tell us, that these formidable animals frequently upset canoes in the river, when every one in them is sure to perish. These came so close to us, that we could reach them with the butt-end of a gun. When I fired at the first, which I must have hit, every one of them came to the surface of the water, and pursued us so fast over to the north bank, that it was with the greatest difficulty imaginable we could keep before them. Having fired a second time, the report of my gun was followed by a loud roaring noise, and we seemed to increase our distance from them. There were two Bornou men among our crew who were not so frightened as the rest, having seen some of these creatures before on Lake Tchad, where, they say, there are plenty of them. However, to stop at any of them, as none of the natives the terrible hippopotami did us no kind of misthet terrible hippopotami di ment, no doubt, at first when we interrupted them; but had they upset our canoe, we should have paid dearly for it. We observed a bank on the north side of the river shortly after this, and I proposed halting on it for the night, for I wished much to put my foot on firm land again. This, however, not one of the crew would consent to, saying, that if the Gewo Rous, or water elephant, did not kill them, the crocodiles certainly would do so before the morning, and I thought afterwards that we might have been carried off like the Cumbrie people on the islands near Yaoorie, if we had tried the experiment. Our canoe is only large enough to hold us all when sitting, so that we have no chance of lying down. Had we been able to muster up thirty thousand cowries at Rabba, we might have purchased one which would have carried us all very comfortably. A canoe of this sort would have served us for living in entirely, we should have had no occasion to land excepting to obtain our provisions; and having performed our day's journey, might have anchored fearlessly at night. Finding we could not induce our people to land, we agreed to continue on all night. The eastern horizon became very dark, and the lightning more and more vivid; indeed, I never recollect having seen such strong fork lightning before in my life. All this denoted the approach of a storm. At eleven P.M. it blew somewhat stronger than a gale, and at midnight the storm was at its height. The wind was so strong, that it washed over the sides of the canoe several times, so that she was in danger of filling. Driven about by the wind, our frail little bark became unmanageable; but at length we got near a bank, which in some measure protected us, and we were fortunate enough to lay hold of a thorny tree against which we were driven, and which was growing nearly in the centre of the stream. Presently we fastened the canoe to its branches. and wrapping our cloaks round our persons, for we felt overpowered with fatigue, and with our legs projecting half over the sides of the little vessel, which, for want of room, we were compelled to do, we lay down to sleep. There is something, I believe, in the nature of a tempest which is favourable to slumber, at least so thought my brother; for though the thunder continued to roar, and the wind to blow,though the rain beat in our faces, and our canoe lay rocking like a cradle, still he slept soundly. The wind kept blowing hard from the eastward till midnight, when it became calm. The rain then descended in torrents, accompanied by thunder and lightning of the most awful description. We lay in our canoe drenched with water, and our little vessel was filling so fast, that two people were obliged to be constantly baling out the water to keep her afloat. The water-elephants, as the natives term the hippopotami, frequently came snorting near us, but fortunately did not touch our canoe. The storm continued until three in the morning of the 17th, when it became clear, and we saw the stars sparkling like gems over our heads. Therefore, we again proceeded on our journey down the river, there being sufficient light for us to see our way, and two hours after, we put into a small, insignificant, fishing village, called Dacannie, where we lauded very gladly. Be-fore we arrived at this island, we had passed a great many native towns and villages, but in consequence of the early hour at which we were travelling, we considered it would be imprudent alarmed the inhabitants, and been taken for a party of robbers; or, as they are called in the country, jacallees. They would have taken up arms against us, and we might have lost our lives; so that for our safety we continued down the river, although we had great desire to go on shore. In the course of the day and night, we travelled, according to our estimation, a distance little short of a hundred miles. Our course was nearly east. The Niger in many places, and for a considerable way, presented a very magnificent appearance, and, we believe, to be nearly eight miles in width.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

ROVAL INSTITUTION

DR. RITCHIE on his late researches respecting the laws which govern the action of the voltaic pile, illustrated by experiment. In No. 785 of the Literary Gazette, article "Royal Society," we have laid before our readers an ample report of these interesting researches, to which we now refer, as it wholly supersedes the necessity of our going into detail on the present occasion.

At the close of Dr. Ritchie's lecture and experiments, Mr. Costello exhibited in the lecture-room that beautiful piece of artificial anatomy, if we may be allowed the expression, which has been constructed and brought to this country by Dr. Auzoux of Paris. It is built up of several hundred pieces, representing muscle, nerve, tendon, &c. of exact form and proportion. The pieces may be taken asunder, are firm and strong, and capable of bearing any tear and wear. The whole gives a correct idea of the form and situation of each portion of the human body. Mr. Costello delivered explanatory observations on the subject.

Amongst the productions exhibited in the library was a specimen of English beet-root

ROYAL ASTRONOMICAL SOCIETY.

ANNIVERSARY MEETING: - Fr. Baily, Esq. in the chair. Dr. Brinkley, Bishop of Cloyne, was re-elected president. A report from the council was read, in which particular reference was made to the labours of the late astronomer royal at the Cape of Good Hope, and to Mrs. Somerville's work on the Mechanism of the Heavens. Since the former anniversary, there not having been any discoveries connected with the theory or labours in the practice of astro-nomy of sufficient importance, in the opinion of the Society, to deserve honorary distinction, no award of medals was announced.

LITERARY AND LEARNED. ROYAL SOCIETY.

H. R. H. the Duke of Sussex in the chair. The third and concluding part of Sir Charles Bell's paper on the human voice was read. This portion of the paper was chiefly occupied with an investigation into the anatomical structure and peculiarities of the parts employed in producing articulate sounds; a review was also taken of the opinions of philologists and grammarians, from the time of Bishop Wilkins to the present day, on the formation of these sounds. Like the two former, this part of Sir Charles's communication was replete with anatomical facts and reasonings of great interest. The Royal Academy of Berlin, through Professor Encke, presented a Continuation of their Chart of the pell his Travels; other valuable donations were also made by the Board of Longitude of France, &c.

At the conversazione in the library the death of Professor Seebeck, of Berlin, so well known to the philosophers of this country by his important researches in electro-magnetism, was spoken of with much regret.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.

Mr. Hamilton in the chair.—Mr. Crofton Croker exhibited a document, bearing the signature and seal of the poet Spenser, which had just been found by him among a collection of MSS. relating to Irish history. It was a sort of demise, to one Henry, of the woods in Balliganim, with the rushes and brakes, and a castle, called Richardston, for himself and his cattle in time of war; binding Henry to repair the same castle, and pledging himself to use good neighbourhood to him and his. But the principal value of the document consisted in the extreme rarity of Spenser's autograph, which was written thus—Ed: Speer.

The secretary read part of a communication from Mr. Madden on the history of the game of chess, in reference to the ancient chessmen discovered in one of the western islands of Scotland, and some time since exhibited to the Society. Mr. Madden observed, that among the numerous writers on the game of chess, few, if any, had entered on its history. Some ancient notices of the game had carried it back even to the second century; but by accounts more worthy of attention, it appeared that chess was well known to the mother of the Emperor Constantine, and that the Latins of the Greek or lower empire had derived it from the Arabs. According to some of the old romances, the pieces were so large, that when the parties quarrelled, they were used as clubs. The paper went into a minute and individual description of the pieces found in Scotland.

FINE ARTS.

On Monday evening, Mr. Westmacott, the professor of sculpture, delivered the first of his series of lectures at the Academy, for the present session. In his review of Egyptian, Etruscan, and early Greek sculpture, the professor commented on the various epochs of those countries, and illustrated their principles in art, by exhibiting several very interesting specimens. In the former (the Egyptian) Mr. Westmacott took occasion to congratulate the Royal Academy and the country, in possessing, through the zeal of a nobleman, not less distinguished for his high birth, than for his taste and indefatigable researches in Egypt, a monument, whether considered for attention to nature, feeling, and grandeur of form, surpassing any other known to exist; and from which it would appear, that the laws which restricted the Egyptian sculptors in the personification of their deities and kings, and forbade their examination, we must presume, of the human body, did not extend to animals.

The country owes this valuable acquisition in ancient art to Lord Prudhoe, who, in his journey up the Nile, discovered two statues of lions, of heroic size, both in red granite, near Jibbel Birkel, on the banks of the river of that name, and about eighty miles above Dongola. They were near the ruins of several temples, on the site of an ancient town, probably the metropolis of Tiraka, who is called in the Bible the King of Ethlopia. They were suptured in the time of Arrengeh the Third the Mern reign. Although there is no accurate account of the date of the execution of these works, yet Amenoph having reigned before the exodus of the Jews from Egypt, and, as far as can be made out, about five reigns preceding, we can with tolerable certainty fix the age of these works at about 1600 or 1650 B.C. On the lions have been inserted inscriptions of an Ethiopian monarch, of a much later date; and this practice, which occasionally throws much difficulty in the way of ascertaining dates, was a very common one with the later princes of Egypt. Lord Prudhoe describes, that on their discovery these lions were as perfect as in the hour they were finished, and were, no doubt, wilfully broken, probably for more easy conveyance, by the individual who was sent expressly from Alexandria to take charge of their removal!!!

The lecture was exceedingly well attended. Amongst those present were Sir Willoughby and Mr. Gordon, Sir F. Vincent, Sir J. Macdonald, Mr. Rich, Mr. Ellis, Dr. Macdonnell, &c. &c.

On Friday, the 10th instant, at a general assembly of the Royal Academy, Gilbert Stuart Newton and Henry Perronet Briggs, Esqrs. were duly elected royal academicians, in the room of John Jackson and James Northcote, Esors. deceased.

BRITISH GALLERY.

No. 59. Eneas, with Achates, meeting Venus disguised as a Huntress, who directs him to Carthage. Copley Fielding.—Under this classical title, the admirer of landscape will find one of the most exquisite compositions that ever delighted his eyes. It will be like a perpetual sunbeam in whatever room it may be destined to adorn. Mr. Fielding has long been known as one of our best painters in water-colours: we congratulate him on the mastery he has acquired over the rival vehicle of oil.

No. 94. An Indian Fruit-seller. W. Daniell, R.A.—How much fuller of interest, both in character and in costume, than an individual of the same class in Europe! Besides the novelty of the subject, the picture has all the advantages of simplicity and grace to recommend it. In Nos. 3, 4, 9, and 10,—the Bunt Fox of Africa, the Spotted Antelope of Ceylon, the Paradise Fly-catcher of Ceylon, and the Indian Rhinoceros,—likewise from the pencil of Mr. Daniell, the fidelity of zoological representation is rendered doubly valuable by the appropriate scenery and accessories.

No. 39. Falstaff, Pistol, and Mrs. Quickly, at the Garter Inn. G. Chint, A.R.A.—The characters are finely conceived, and the whole is carefully painted;—perhaps too much so, for the handling has not the spirit which we are accustomed to see in Mr. Clint's works.

No. 158. The Villager: Morning. R. Rothwell.—A little affected, but possessing extraordinary freshness, brilliance, and beauty of colouring.

No. 186. Lassie herding Sheep. Edwin Landseer, R.A.—Is this "a lady of high degree" in masquerade? The lassie, the sheep, the dog, the landscape, are all full of the magic of Mr. Landseer's pencil.

No. 187. A Spanish Gentleman. H. Liverseege.—And we lament to say the late Mr. Liverseege. Few young artists ever gave greater proof of talent in the familiar walks of the profession. His subjects were always interesting, and evinced mind. His execution had a fluency which belonged to more mature practice; but the charm which principally distinguished his paintings was justness of expression. One of the most admirable exhibitions of this rare quality was in his "Ghost Story," which appeared in the Suffolk Street Gallery in 1830, and was noticed in the Literary Gaussite of that year, page 691. The work the title of which is at the head of this article, is a very elever example of chiaroscure and harmony of colour.

No. 200. The Fish-Market. J. Tennant.—As in every town a fish-market is a valuable acquisition, so in every collection is a picture of this class, especially when it is possessed of so much effect, and exhibits so much skill in execution, as this performance of Mr. Tennant's.

No. 201. Morning. H. Howard, R-A.—From the realities of life, and the every-day sort of people contained in the last-mentioned production, we turn to the contemplation of the vision of the poet, embodied by the peacil of the painter. "Of imagination all compact," this is a beautiful work of art, although somewhat chaotic in its light and shade, and colour.

No. 202. Possession. C. Hancock.—In this spirited performance, Mr. Hancock has hit upon an admirable mode of shewing his powers in depicting animal expression, and has still further advanced his claim to high distinction in that department of art. The quotation in the catalogue has been chosen with great hamour and felicity.

No. 28. A Lady of Rank of the Fifteenth Century taking the Veil. 8. A. Hart.—For what has not superstition to answer! To us, the spectacle of a young and beautiful vestal, secrificing, at the instance perhaps of family pride or avarice, all those social and tender feelings which are the best qualities of human nature, is far mere abhorrent than that of the Indian widow, who exultingly ascends the funeral pile in the hope of an instant re-union with the husband whom she loves. To the painter, however, the subject has afforded an opportunity of producing a fine picture, invested with all the splendid and magnificent accessories called forth by the occasion, and executed in a corresponding style of art.

There are many exceedingly clever landscapes in this room, the merits of which our space forbids us to detail. Among them are No. 165, View on the River Dart, and No. 185, Timber-Waggon creasing a Brook; F. R. Lee; No. 184, Salmon Weir on the Lum, Devon, J. Burnet; No. 88, Going to Market, J. Stark; No. 46, The Upper End of Loch Lomond, and No. 89, Derwent Water, T. C. Hofland; No. 74, View from the Grounds of Sir Harry Featherston, Up Park, and No. 198,

There is an interesting memoir of Mr. Liverseege m No. XIII. of The Library of the Fins Arte, in which, among other things, it is stated that the "Spanish Gentleman" was intended as a representation of Don Quixote in his study.

Manies, on the Soine, C. R. Stanley; No. 108, Barmouth, J. Wilson; No. 110, A Rustic Bridge near Ashbourn, T. Creswick; No. 135, The Tourist, J. J. Chalon, A.R.A.; No. 145, View in North Wales, Miss Gouldsmith; No. 139, Chepstow Castle, H. R. Hilditch; &c. &c. There is also a splendid display of fruit in No. 88, La Festa di Gioja, G. Lance; and in No. 194, Apples and Pears, A.J. Oliver, A.R.A. which, in addition to their other excellencies, will always be found in season.

WEW PUBLICATIONS.

The Seven Apocalyptic Churches. By Charles Macfarlane. The Etchings by Thomas Knox. Rall

As works of art, the plates in this publication are of little value, but they are rendered very interesting in consequence of their subjects and of the text by which they are accompanied.

Sketches in Italy. Drawn on stone by W. Linton. No. VI.

WHEN we say that the examples in the present number are equal in interest and variety to the preceding, we think we are rather under the mark. Some of the views have a spirit and character in their execution such as we could hardly have expected to see in any lithographic publication; and while all possess an interest from their local and picturesque appearance, those of the "Ravine of Sorrento" and the and the "Santa Scholastica" are pre-eminently beautiful. Besides these, the number contains views of "Narni," the "Lake of Como," "Citadel of Ancient Veij," "Temple of Minerva Medica," "Vico," "Temple of Antonine and Faustina." In this, as in all the former parts of the work, Mr. Linton has given a succinct, yet satisfactory, local history of the subjects of his drawings; leaving the reader, very judiciously, to make his own reflections on their picturesque beauties and poetical character.

The Fall of Babylon. Painted and engraved by J. Martin. Moon, Boys, and Graves. THE magnificent original picture, with its accumulated mass of stately edifices, some towering into the skies, others stretching in apparently interminable length to the horizon, and with its multitudinous assemblage of human beings, represented in every variety of energetic action and intense suffering, has long been familiar to the public. The print, as might have been expected, proceeding as it does from Mr. Martin's own hand, is a faithful and spirited translation of it. There are some minor details on which hypercriticism might perhaps employ itself; — among other things it might point out the injurious competition into which the bas-relievos on the wall, illuminated by the pots-à-feu, enter with the actual men and herses engaged so near them; - but where so much has been accomplished, it would be ungrateful and invidious to dwell on such petty matters. In our impression there are some specks, which we trust do not impair the mass of the publication.

Soul. Painted by J. Varley; engraved by J. Linnell. Ackermann.

A WORK of art of greater solemnity and interest never came under our notice. The grandeur, variety, and intricacy of the landscape composition, - the awful general gloom, contrasted and relieved by occasional bursts of vivid light, -the simple arrangement of the long funeral procession, - the statue-like still- THE dinner to commemorate the founding of even the single pelican sipping at the stream, unconscious of the scene of deep human feeling occurring so near him, - altogether produce an effect which it is no exaggeration whatever to chef-d'œuore; and the engraving is admirably executed in mezzotinto by Mr. Linnell.

Canterbury Cathedral. Razee pinx.; J. G. Reeve sculp. Ackermann, London; Ward, Canterbury.

A WEATLY executed view, in aquatinta, of the interior of this venerable and celebrated edifice.

Scenery of the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, Lithographed by S. Leith, Banff, from Drawings in outline by Lieut.-Col. Murray, younger, of Ochtertyre; with descriptive Letter-press. Part I. Morison, Perth.

THE first part of a beautiful national publics. tion, dedicated to the Highland Society of Scotland, and to which we recently alluded in the Lit. Gas. It contains four views, viz. " Loch Marce, Ross-shire;" the "Scuir of Eigg; "Loch Alsh, with Castle Donnan, Ross-shire;" and "Kilchurn Castle, Loch Awe, Argyleshire." Though simple outlines, they convey a perfect idea of the bold and romantic scenery which they represent; as they are drawn with great precision, and executed in a style of lithography singularly clear and beautiful; in which the aerial perspective is preserved with as much truth as in any engraving on copper. The descriptions are very satisfactory, and are written with great taste and spirit.

Portraits of Painters of the Italian, German, Flemish, Dutch, French, and English Schools. Drawn on Stone by H. C. Selous. Part L W. F. Elliot.

"No collection of portraits of painters yet published," says the proprietor of the present undertaking, "has been sufficiently extensive to supply likenesses of the great men who have flourished in different ages, and of different schools, in one uniform series. They have either been limited in number, or have been confined to one school exclusively. In this work it is intended to embrace all who have been eminent, and whose portraits may be extent, from the earliest of the old masters down to those of the present age."

Each Part is to contain four portraits, with brief accounts of the subjects. The heads in this first part are executed in a fine broad style of lithography; and, especially that of John David De Heem, do great credit to Mr. Selous.

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

THE GARRICK CLUB DINNER.

best of the groups of mourning spectators, _ | the Garrick Club took place at their house in |

King Street, on Wednesday: H. R. H. the Duke of Sussex in the chair. About a hundred and twenty members met their royal patron on the occasion; among whom, at various parts of the table, were Lord Mulgrave (the president), Sir George Warrender (vice-president), Lord Saltoun, Lord F. L. Gower, Lord Tullamoore, Lord W. Lennox, Lord Castlereagh, Lord A. Hill, Sir J. C. Hobhouse, Sir George Clerk, Sir J. Anstruther, Messrs. Hodgson, Kempe, Ramsbottom, Capt. Polhill, and other members of Parliament; Mr. Lincoln Stanhope, M'Leod of Parliament; Mr. Lincoln Stanlope, in Leon of M'Leod, F. Mills, F. Sheridan, Mr. J. Murray, W. Fraser, C. Kemble, Arnold, Mathews, Sir G. Smart, Hawes, T. Cooke, Braham, Jones, Bartley, Wallack, Linley, C. Taylor, Duruset, Harley, Power, Sola, Clint, Stanfield, Grieve, James Smith, Planché, Poole, Trueba, Beazley, B. Oakley, Hamilton Reynolds, G. Robins, &c. &c.; indeed almost every individual present was more or less connected with literature and the drama. The dinner provided was excellent, and the accommodation altogether of a very superior description; doing infinite credit to the manager of the establishment.

On the removal of the cloth the King was drank with great applanse, as was also the toast of the Queen and royal family. In introducing the toast of "Success to the Garrick Club, H. R. H. described its principal object, to afford a rallying point for the lovers of the drama, and bestowed a high encousium on the plan, at once liberal and economical, which had been adopted by the committee in carrying the design of the subscribers into effect. It was received with enthusiasm; and after this, the fatiguing ceremony of three times three was dispensed with.

Mr. Braham sang the following song, written by Mr. James Smith, in the most admirable

THE GARRICK CLUR.

Air - " To Anacreon in heaven."

Jove sat on Olympus, in glory array'd,
Compeller of clouds, armed for battle complete,
When io! from Elysium upcoaring, a shade
Knelt down, in mute grace, at the Thunderer's fost;
The sight seemed to move

Heaven's conclave above,
Thalis, Meiponaene, eyed him with love —
'Twas Garrick, up-travelling Jove's fiat to gain
To bring back the stage to its glory again.

"Twont do!" bellowed Momus; " as well might you strive strive

To jump, little man, o'er the Apennine hills;
'Twas all mighty well when Queen Anne was alive,
And wit greeted fashion at 'Buttons' or 'Wills'.
Will wit call a chair,
Or fashion repair
From Baker Street North, or remote Belgrave Square,
And seek Covent Garden, or seek Drury Lane,
To bring back the stage to its glory again?"

"Right, Monnus," quoth Sove, "that's a poser, my lad;
The town's too enormous; its play-goen few:
Your project, I fear, little David, is had;
You'll find that collath too mighty for you. Unless you can trace

Some concentrated place
Where play-going people may meet face to face,
I fear, David Garrick, your effort is vain
To bring back the drama to glory again."

Dread sit," cried the actor, "your cansure forego,
My London committee have settled all that;
King Street, Covent Garden's the locus in quo,
It finish the Plazza." Quoth Jove, "Verbum sat:
Light Hermes, my son,
Be off with a run,
And bear Garrick back, for his business is done;
Go enter our name in the Club; for we fain
Would guide back the drawn to glory again.

Each god for our dinner his pic-nic prepares;
Red Bacchus gives wine, with its bottles and corks;
Pomona contributes figs, apples, and pears,
And Vulcan has forged us our knives and our forks;
To blason the boos,

From the realms of the moon,
I, minstrel unworthy, now give it a tune—
Awake, tuneful echo, respond to my strain!
And call back the drama to glory again!

Ye friends of the drama, give car to my song—
To strengthen Jove's flat and bind us anew,
One bright ray of hope shoots the welkin along,
That ray, star of Brunswick, is beaming from you;
Led on by its light
We assemble to-night,
Our new Garrick Club in one bond to unite:
Then join hand in hand, persevere might and main,
And light up the drama to glory again.
Chorus—Then join, &c.

The Earl of Mulgrave proposed the health of the royal chairman, with a few brief but appropriate remarks, in which he expressed the gratitude of the Club for H. R. Highness's condescension in allowing himself to be placed at its head, and in taking the interest in its prosperity which he had insured by his presence that day. The applause having ceased, H. R. Highness returned thanks, and dwelt at great length on the moral and national for another hour carried on the conviviality of effects which might be produced by those great the evening in the most pleasant style; elicitengines the press and the stage, by their union and by their right direction.

The following glee, written by a member of the Club, was charmingly sung by the musical party, led by Sir G. Smart.

Let poets of superior parts
Consign to deathless fame
The larcenies of the knave of hearts, Who robbed his royal dame

The honest muse uch themes eschews Disdains all knavish cubs; And halls to-day, With joyous lay, With joyous lay, Thy birth, fair Queen of Clubs.

Salve, Regina! Esto perpetua! Hail! Hail! Hall! Illustrious Queen of Clubs!

The chairman now gave the health of Lord Mulgrave, and noticed the zeal with which his lordship had devoted himself to the formation of the Club, as well as his general patronage of the drama. His lordship, in return for the compliment, which was loudly cheered by the company, spoke in a very feeling and elegant manner; acknowledging his love for drama, and declaring the pleasure he felt in promoting all its interests. He alluded playfully to the days when these interests were taken in hand by the wits at Buttons' and Wills'; but Buttons' and Wills' had in our day given place to Brooks' and Crockford's, where other sorts of plays were more encouraged; and it was in some measure to fill up the want thus created, that had led to the foundation of the Garrick Club. At the same time his lordship pointed out various ways by which the welfare of the stage might be promoted by the meetings of its friends in these rooms; guarding the members, however, from entertaining too high expectations in this respect. This address, of which we can only give so faint an outline, was frequently and warmly applauded; as was also an amusing exposition by H. R. H. on drinking the health of the ladies, and especially those who were the ornaments of the drama, in which he alluded to the gods as well as the goddesses, who exercised an influence on the scene.

The following song, composed by Mr. Sola. was ably sung by that gentleman.

Come, fill the bowl, and wake the song, Let mirth our jovial hours prolong; And wit shed round its brilliant light, And wit shed round its brilliant light,
To lengthen out this joyous night.
O what were life, if wine's sweet power
Were wanting in the festive hour?
And what were wine, if friendship's ray
Drove not its angry fumes away?
Then fill your glasses to the brim,
And let the soul in nectar swim;
Fill, fill, and join the toast with me,
Here's to our Club, with three times three!

Knowing that all around I see, At Garrick's name are filled with glee, I'd drink to each, but then my song Would tedious grow, by growing long.

But though the time will not allow To drink to each friend singly now; Yet fill to one, my toast is there, Our Royal chief that fills the chair. Then fill, &c.

Now fill once more, and drink to all Who fill the cause for which we meet; For though the drama ne'er can fall, With friends so true as those we greet, Yet thousands more shall feel the glow That warms the hearts of all around;
And from our Club a stream shall flow,
T'enrich the drama's classic ground.
Then fill, &c.

The ensuing toasts were Capt. Polhill, and success to Drury Lane Theatre; Mr. Kemble, and success to Covent Garden: to both of which these gentlemen made suitable replies.

About 11 o'clock H. R. H. retired, when Lord W. Lennox was called to the chair, and ing speech and song alternately from among the merry party who rallied round him.

We had forgotten to mention the "Lord Mayor's Day," and another song, sung in his happiest vein, by Mathews; and the "Grand Mogul," by Harley.

Mr. Zachary's Vase from the wood of Shakspeare's mulberry-tree was on the table before the chair; but we would refer our readers to the Literary Gazette, No. 439, (June 1825,) for an account and wood-cut of the real cup presented by the corporation of Stratford on Avon to Garrick, at the Jubilee in 1769. This cup was sold by Mr. Christie, and bought by Mr. J. Johnston for 1271. 1s. in whose possession it now is (curiously enough), within four doors of the Garrick Club-house. The tree, as we then related, was cut down in 1756, when about 140 years old: the cup is valued at above 200 guineas; a fair price when we say

" Behold this fair goblet."

In conclusion, we have much gratification in stating that this entertainment delighted every gentleman who partook of it; and has added materially to the attractions of the Garrick

ORIGINAL SPECIMEN OF A VALENTINE.

ORIGINAL SPECIMEN OF A VALENTINE.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—I was yesterday very much surprised, on putting on a pair of lambswool stockings, to find a small hole in the heel of one of them darned with brown silk: I, of course, wondered much at this phenomenon; and for the whole day, and the greater part of last night, I was racking my brains to discover what my laundress could mean by such a freak. The enclosed Valentine, which I received this morning, explained the mystery; and as it may perhaps amuse some of your readers, I have taken the liberty of sending you the original, as received.—I am, &c.

DRAMA.

DRURY LANE.

Ox Thursday a clever farce from the pen of Mr. Kenney, and called Self-Tormentor, was produced at this theatre, and happily reached the haven of popular success. Its chief burden is cast on the able shoulders of Farren, who performs the part of a Mr. Crotchet delightfully. Harley and Mrs. Orger have also characters into which they throw much humour, and are rewarded by the hearty laughter of the audience. Mr. H. Johnston, after an absence of ten years, has resumed his station at this theatre, and seems to have lost none of his power of pleasing.

THE STRAND SUBSCRIPTION THEATRE.

AT this pretty and parlour-like theatre, Mystification, a burletta, has been successfully performed throughout the week; Mrs. Waylett, in four sisters, displays much versatility and talent; and a Welsh musical prodigy has been added to the popular attractions.

ROYAL PAVILION. - Eugene Aram has been dramatised here.

VARIETIES.

Safety Bridle. - The description of a new sort of bridle has just been put into our hands, (accompanied by an etching). It is the invention of a Mr. Messer, and consists of a pullev so contrived to act upon the bit and mouth, that the most ungovernable horse must infallibly be stopped at once, whether in riding or Death of Mrs. Musters. - The Miss Chaworth, who was if not the first fair who inspired the muse of Byron, at least that one to whom the chief portion of his early love effusions were addressed, died on Sunday at the age of 46. Her death was the consequence of cold and fright, having sought shelter in the shrubbery when the Nottingham rioters sacked her seat, Colwick Hall, in October last.

Anatomical Studies. - His Majesty has made a present of M. Ausoux's anatomical model of the human figure to the King's College: we believe these productions cost somewhat about 1904

Polish Literature. Messrs. A. Bczezina and Co. are now receiving subscriptions for a work which is shortly to appear at Lemberg, entitled, Lexicon of the Polish Literati, by Ignaz Chodvnicki, sub-prior of the Carmelite convent at Lemberg. It is arranged alphabetically, in three volumes octavo, and contains brief memoirs of the most celebrated Polish classical writers, poets, orators, philosophers, mathematicians, astronomers, physicians, surgeons, theologians, jurists, politicians, historians, philologists, writers on statistics, and many other celebrated characters, from the introduction of Christianity and civilisation in this country to the present time; together with an accurate statement of their productions, both published and in MSS. with a critical review of the most important of these writings.

Universities in Spain. - Prior to the year 1806 there were 22 universities in Spain; in that year they were reduced to 11, and at present there are 16. Of these, three are mayores or universities of the first class, situated in Salamanca, Valladolid, and Alcala; the remainder are styled menores, or universities of the second class, which are in Valencia, Cervera, Saragossa, Grenada, Seville, Cordova, Oviedo, Santjago, Huesca, Murcia, Orihuela, Ossena, and Onata. The whole of these universities are but miserably endowed, and only in Salamanca the professors receive a salary suitable to their office. But the professors of philosophy and mathematics in all the universities are the worst provided for, and many receive scarcely 301. per annum. Whoever among them is so 30%. per annum. fortunate as to make 300 dollars a-year, considers himself well off. Hence the professorships, even in Salamanca, are not much sought after, and are regarded merely as an introduction to more lucrative offices. In general, the holders exercise some profession independent of their office. Government, which pays the strictest attention to every object connected with instruction, issued in 1824 an ordinance for the regulation of schools and universities. By an official report, which was published in 1825, the instruction in modern philosophy was banished from the latter, as having a tendency to scepticism, and instruction in the old logic and metaphysics recom-

A long-felt desideratum in our literary world is in a fair way of being satisfactorily filled, by the publication of a new journal here under the title of Magazin für die Literatur des Auslandes; or, Foreign Literary Gazette. It is to appear three times a-week, and the size is a pretty large sheet of foolscap, containing eight very closely-printed columns, of ninety-six lines each. The first number, which has been published to-day, contains long extracts from Lord Dover's "Life of Frederick the Second," which is spoken of very favourably. The extracts given are all relative to Marshal Keith (the Review to be concluded in No. II). Then follow the titles of half-a-dozen new English books; a Review of No. III. of the French book of the Hundred and One Authors; notices of some recent works; the annual meeting of the Royal Society (from Statistics of St. Petersburg .- A St. Petersburg journal contains the following interesting facts relative to the population, &c. of that city during the year 1831. This capital contains a population of 448,221 inhabitants, of which 316,211 are males, and 132,010 are females; of these, 1924 are ecclesiastics, 42,901 belong to the rank of nobles, 45,829 to the military, 6,800 merchants; 44,393 citizens, 11,795 artisans, 117,426 peasants, 65,119 to various independent ranks, 98,098 servants of the nobility, 2,911 to the suburb of Ochta, and 13,035 are foreigners. The number of births was 6,511, of which 3,515 are boys and 2,996 girls; 1,041 marriages were solemnised; there were 25,715 deaths; of these 9,258, namely, 5,820 men and 3,438 women, died of the cholera; by which 13,152 persons, namely, 8,856 men and 4,296 women, were attacked.—In the year 1831, St. Petersburg contained 140 Greco-Russian churches, 20 for dissenters, and 19 for foreign congregations; 2 convents, 4 chapels, 4 archiepiscopal palaces, 9 other palaces, 2,654 stone and 5,330 wooden houses. There were also 187 manufactories, of which 12 were newly established; 140,602 head of oxen, 15,350 sheep, and 537 hogs, were brought to market alive; carcasses of various animals killed out of the city, 46,000; meat of various kinds, 71,000 poods (of 36lb.); poultry, 428,720 head; feathered game, 212,738; eggs, 314,483 dozen; butter, 94,937 poods, and 783 waggon-loads; oats, 180,440 chetwerts, and 86,000 sacks; other grain, 52,450 chetwerts, and 309,483 sacks; flour and meal, 33,310 chetwerts, 1,138,718 sacks, and 2,332 poods; malt 52,000 sacks, &c.

Population of Russia. Population of Russia, 43,700,000; grand duchy of Finland, 1,250,000; kingdom of Poland, 4,050,000. To tal of the whole Russian empire, 49,000,000. The population of Georgia, Imeretia, Mingrelia, Guriel, Armenia, - in a word, all the countries to the south of the Caucasus and the mouth of the Terek, from which no official returns have been received, is estimated at 1,200,000. The military amount to 743,537; in this are included the Cossacks, Calmucks, and the no-made Bashkirs; the Bogols and Samoides, 6,000. The inhabitants of Siberia, whether nomade or fixed, who pay tribute in furs, 400,000. Among the clergy, there are 6,638 Mahometan mollahs for the Tartars, and 150 lamas for the Calmucks.—Russian Mercury.

Sir, - In the last number of your invaluable Gazette you seem to infer that the annual returns of the births and deaths in Rome must be incorrect, from there being a greater quantity of the latter than the former, and also more than a proportionable decrease of marriages, yet an increased population. When you consider the multitude of monks and nuns who annually arrive from the provinces, together with the proverbial immorality of the Romans, consequently the variety of births which it would not be politic to register, and of course not in the public returns, will account for the incorrectness of them, if it may be so termed, when they are as correct as circumstances will allow. I am, &c. MENTOR.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

The Literary History of Galloway. By Thomas Murray, A. M. Second Edition. 8vo. pp. 348. Edinburgh, 1832, Waugh and Innes; Dublin, Curry and Co.: London, Whittaker and Co.

This is a work of great local and much general interest. We are glad to see it has reached a second edition, for this is a species of literature which well deserves encouragement. Merit is stimulated by record; and local histories preserve much that would otherwise perish. Give a place, like a man, a good character, and the chances are, it will endeavour to support it. We select the following miscellaneous extracts. Welsh was one of the early reformers of the Scotch church, and the annexed is a summary of his life, after his banishment, for matters of faith, to France.

"Welsh, on his arrival in France, applied with so much ardour to the study of the language of the country, that in about fourteen weeks he was able to preach in it. He was first settled minister of a Protestant congregation at Nerac, from whence he was afterwards removed to St. Jean d'Angely, a town of Lower Charente, where he continued to labour in the work of the ministry until a short time before he left that country. The following extraordinary circumstances must not be passed over in silence. In the war which, in 1620, Lewis XIII. king of France, waged against his Protestant subjects, St. Jean d'Angely was be-sieged by his majesty in person. Welsh, who assured the magistrates that God would deliver them, not only encouraged his fellow-citizens by his exhortations, but ascended the walls and resolutely assisted in defending the garrison. The siege terminated in a way highly gratifying to the defenders. A treaty was concluded, by which the full and free exercise of their religious principles was secured them, and the king was to be allowed to enter the town in a friendly manner with his troops. A law at that time existed in France, that wherever the king resided, there should be no public exercise of any form of worship different from that which he adopted; and accordingly the magistrates of St. Jean d'Angely requested Mr. Welsh to forbear preaching on the ensuing Sabbath. 'It is making,' says Welsh, with his characteristic firmness, 'no good requital to God for your delivery, to hinder his worship: for my part, except I am violently hindered, I will go to the public place, and preach to any that come; and if none come, I will go home and bewail the miseries that are coming upon you.' This resolute conduct was productive of the happiest effects. Not only was there a greater meeting than on any former occasion, but many persons of the Catholic religion, who belonged to the royal troops, were among the number of his hearers. The king bearing of the determination of Welsh, and offended at his presumption, despatched the Duke d'Esperon, with some of the guard, to bring him from the pulpit into his lity and faithfulness confined to Welsh himself, it was the Lord's mind that I should marry

When Welsh saw the duke enter | His amiable wife was distinguished by the same the church with an armed guard, he was not intimidated. Making a pause in his discourse. he ordered a seat to be set for the Marshal of France, - and 'commanded him, in the name his worship.' The duke, struck with the dignity of Welsh, and the air of authority with which he spoke, involuntarily obeyed his 'commands,' and listened to the sermon with decorum and seriousness. When the services of the church were over, the duke brought him before the king, who demanded of him 'how he durst preach, it being against the law to do it so near the king?' 'If your majesty,' replied Welsh, knew what I preach, you would command others, and come yourself to hear it; for I preach salvation by Jesus Christ; and I am sure your own conscience tells you that your own works will never merit salvation to you; I preach that there is none on the earth above you, which none of those about you that adhere to the pope will say.' This unexpected reply so pleased the king, that he exclaimed, 'Very well; you shall be my minister, —addressed him by the name of 'Father,' and promised him his protection. And circumstances soon occurred to try the faith of his majesty's promise. St. Jean d'Angely having been besieged and taken the subsequent year, Lewis ordered M. de Vitry, one of his generals, to plant a guard at Mr. Welsh's house, that he might receive no injury; and soon afterwards, himself and his family were conveyed, at his majesty's expense, to Rochelle. Welsh was not yet far advanced in years; but from the length of his confinement in Scotland, the exertions he had made as a minister of the gospel, and the various calamities of his life, his constitution now began to fail him, and symptoms of a pulmonary nature were visible. Being told by his physicians, that the only chance he could have of prolonging his life, was to breathe his native air, he repaired to Campvere in Zealand, from which he sent supplications to the British king, for permission to return to Scotland. He only, however, obtained leave to return to London; nor would he be allowed to visit his native land, unless he gave his approbation of the ecclesiastical polity then established there. For extorting this submission, Dr. John Young, his majesty's chaplain, waited on him, and conversed with him on the subject. His principles, however, had been too long cherished, and too deeply rooted, to be easily shaken; he spurned every compromise of them, or the most indirect approval of prelacy; he had all his life suffered in opposing arbitrary and corrupt measures, and had never yet regretted the part he had acted; he had not hesitated to confront death when in the very meridian of his days, and it was not to be expected, that now he would endeavour to purchase a few years of precarious existence by abandoning or betray-spirit. This lady, having obtained access to his majesty, petitioned him to grant her husband liberty to return to his native country.

James replied, that if she would persuade him of God, whose servant he was, not to disturb to submit to episcopal authority, permission should be given him. Mrs. Welsh, lifting up her apron, and holding it towards the king, answered, in a spirit worthy of her father and her husband, 'Please your majesty, I'd rather kep [receive] his head there.' The termination of his life was characteristic of the tenor of it. James, in opposition to all entreaty, had prohibited him from preaching in London, until he heard that his death could not be far distant. As soon as Welsh was informed of his majesty's resolution, he availed himself of the privilege which it allowed him; and having obtained a pulpit, preached with his usual animation and energy. It was a last and expiring effort, and seems to have hastened his end; for he retired to his chamber, and, within two hours, died without a struggle. This event took place in 1622, in the fiftieth year of his age."

Our next is an example of spiritual courtship, and also of the temper and peculiarities of those times.

"When in Ireland, Livingstone was married to a daughter of Bartholomew Fleming, merchant in Edinburgh, then on a visit to her sister, Mrs. John M'Lellan, of whose husband we have already spoken. His court-ship was singular, and affords a curious proof of the spirituality of his principles. 'Mr. Blair propounded to me that marriage; immediately thereafter I was sent to London to have gone to New England, and returned the June following. I had seen her several times before in Scotland, and had the testimony of many of her gracious disposition; yet I was for nine months seeking or I could get direction from God anent that business, during which time I did not offer to speak to her, (who, I believe, had not heard any thing of the matter,) only for want of clearness in my mind; although I was twice or thrice in the house, and saw her frequently at communions and public meetings; and it's like I might have been longer in such darkness, except the Lord had presented an occasion of our conferring together; for, on November 10th, 1634, when I was going to the Friday meeting at Antrim, I foregathered with her, and some others, going thither, and propounded to them by the way, to confer upon a text whereon I was to preach the day after at Antrim, wherein I found her conference so judicious and spiritual, that I took that for some answer to my prayer to have my mind cleared, and blamed myself that I had not before taken occasion to confer with her. Four or five days after, I proponed the matter, and desired her to think upon it; and after a week or two, I went to her mother's house, and being alone ing a cause which he had identified with the with her, desiring her answer, I went to prayer, glory of God, and with the temporal and eternal and urged her to pray, which at last she did; interests of mankind. Nor was this inflexibi- and in that time I got abundant clearness, that her, and then propounded the matter more fully to her mother; and albeit I was then fully cleared, I may truly say, it was about a month after before I got marriage affection to her, although she was for personal endowments beyond many of her equals; and I got it not till I obtained it by prayer, but thereafter I had greater difficulty to moderate it."

Lady Stair's Pun .- " Graham of Claverhouse (commonly pronounced Clavers,) was appointed sheriff of Wigtonshire in 1682. On one occasion, when this violent persecutor had been inveighing in her presence against our illustrious reformer, she said, 'Why are you so severe on the character of John Knox? You are both reformers: he gained his point by cla-vers; you attempt to gain yours by knocks!" "

Specimen of Mr. M. Ray's curious Translation of the Scriptures .- " Before the silver cord (the marrow of the back-bone, with its root and branches) be contracted; or the golden vial (the brain's membranes) be cracked; or the pitcher be broken at the fountain, (the cavities and conveyers of the blood from the heart,) or the wheel be broken at the cistern, (the returners of it from the lungs, liver, head, hands, and feet); the double, yea quadruple circulation (galal and ruts) being repeated, be interrupted and cease. 3 Kings iv. 33."

A different version is here given of the celebrated story of the Bride of Lammermoor.

"Of the daughters of Viscount Stair, Janet, the eldest, was married to David Dunbar. younger of Baldoon, but survived her marriage only four weeks and a few days. Her early death, at such an interesting period, seems to have given rise to much superstitious credulity, heightened or generated by personal malignity, or by the violence of party-spirit which then predominated. The same feelings, in which this credulity originated, have perpetuated, if not increased it, till the present day. The tradition, however, has assumed two different shapes, the one being quite the reverse of the other. To the gossiping and illiberal editor of Law's "Memorials," it has afforded occasion to a most coarse and wanton attack on the illustrious family to whom the young lady be-longed; while it suggested to Sir Walter Scott, however absurdly, the idea of 'The Bride of Lammermoor.' The gossip referred to, while it is of a most conflicting and incredible description, seems to me to be altogether unfounded in truth. The Rev. Andrew Symson. minister of Kirkinner, the parish in which Baldoon is situated, and where the young bride with her husband had arrived a fortnight after their mariage, in his 'Elegy on the

""At this time, it is evident, from the tenor of Symson's poem, that she was in good health and sound mind; a circumstance quite at variance with either version of the tradition. According to the one, the bridegroom, in a state of insanity, endeavoured to murder the bride; according to the other, the bride, in a state of frensy, from which she never recovered, attempted with a knite ok lil her husband. Violence, however, is never alluded to by Symson: on the contrary, he expressly states that she did 'enjoy' the happiness of the marriage state for some 'little time;' which could not have been the case, had murder been attempted by either party, or had madness seized either of them. This 'little time' evidently continued at least till she was 'brought home' to Baldoon; on which occasion, says Symson, 'we did all rejoyce even for her sake.' The story, in time, originated on superstitious ignorance, or in the rancour of personal or political enmity, and has since been illiberally perpetuated by episcopal and Jacobite writers.

"We did enjoy great mirth; but now, ah me! Our joyful song's turn'd to an elegic.

From his silence on the subject, indeed, the very contrary is evident; and we regard him as the only competent authority that can be adduced."

There have been a great many additions made to this volume since its first appearance.

Chantilly. 3 vols. 12mo. London, 1832. Bull. WE have been very much pleased with the tales contained in these volumes. If by a youthful writer, which from internal evidence we should say they were, there is in them great promise of future excellence in historic romance. The first story is the longest and best; the interest of it is vividly excited and well sustained, and the animation of actual life well thrown into the picturesque costume of the past. The period is that of Henri III.: and the hero is a young seigneur unjustly deprived of his estates - a species of French Ravenswood, though there is nothing in the narrative to incur a charge of imitation. two others are laid in the time of Charlemagne and in that of Louis IX.; of these we prefer the last. Altogether Chantilly is one of those works of which it is difficult to judge by a brief extract, which can convey little idea how well the interest is kept up from first to last, that great merit of narrative fiction. We give the following scene, more as a specimen of the style than the story

"It was a small dark apartment, hung round with tapestry, the ceiling richly decorated with massive ornaments of carved oak, and the floor covered with a dark-coloured carpet of Turkey manufacture, so thick and soft that the footsteps fell unheard as they advanced over it. It was here that the monarch usually spent his leisure hours, and various were the objects indicative of his tastes and habits scattered around, in a confusion which completely put to flight all ideas of study or devotion in the mind of the visitor. On a small table near the door were strewn divers preparations for the toi-lette, and cosmetics for improving the complexion, of which the king used quantities almost incredible, all prepared by his own hand; and the mixing and arranging of these formed his greatest delight and amusement. In the recesses on each side the window stood two highly-polished ebony cases, which Catherine de Medicis, his mother, had brought from Italy, for containing books and holy relies; but for this they were totally useless to the present royal owner, who applied them to a far different purpose. On the lower shelf next the ground were arranged small ornamental baskets, in each of which, on satin cushions, reposed in regal luxury a litter of spaniel puppies. which, together with their pampered mother, did not fail to salute with deafening noise any stranger who entered. The messes, medicines, and food of these little favourites completely filled the upper shelves, or only disputed ground with the chains and collars of their predecessors, a few of whom, rescued from oblivion, stood on the top, seemingly ready as in life to fly out with inhospitable fury on the approach of intruders. The upper compartments of the window were of painted glass, and cast a dis-

It was at table that Henry himself was seated, with head resting on his hands, and apparer buried in thought. The noisy greeting of spaniels as La Vallée entered, caused him start, and he turned towards the door anxious unquiet look, bespeaking distrust apprehension, which, however, quickly chan to one of pleasure as he heard the name : recognised the features of his visitor. king was at that time in the very flower of age, and yet he appeared no longer you The cares of royalty, the murder of the Gui had planted many a deep and lasting fun on his brow, which time would have others withheld for many years. We cordially recommend Chantilly, - it 1 much of that dramatic power of incident whi is the great charm of the Canterbury Take few readers will, we think, begin and not wi to continue it to the end.

Tour of a German Prince, &c. &c. Vol. I 12mo. pp. 384. London, 1832. Wilson. ANOTHER volume of this amusing work l just appeared, and claims our passing noti-On the whole, we do not find it quite so ent taining as the preceding portion; partly ! cause the dash and novelty of the thing is little worn off—partly because the author h gone considerably into more trite and commo place subjects—and partly because the translator has, in his discretion, made many a hiatus where, perhaps, the very impertinence of the suppression would have piqued the curiosity, if it offended the taste, of readers. There are, nevertheless, some pleasant bits in this mosaic, out of which we will try to con-struct a specimen for our Gasette; though we cannot pre-face it with a portrait, as in the book, of the Prince Puckler Muskau, in his uniform, bedisened with orders, and looking as captivating and killing as dress, mustache, large eyes, and the indescribable air of a venividi-vici-man can make him.

Behold him, therefore, as he is, after ten years of absence, again (Sept. 1826) a visitor to England, and a delineator of our national manners.

At Newmarket: - "The first day I was gifted with such a prophetic vision, that twice, by the mere exercise of my proper observation and judgment, I betted upon the winner at the saddling, and gained a considerable sum. But I had the usual fate of play;—what I won that day I lost the next, and as much more to boot. Whoever is a permanent winner here, is sure of his game beforehand; and it is well known that the principles of many of the English nobility are remarkably wide and expansive on this head. Among the company present I found several old acquaintances, who gave me permission to see their running horses in the stable, which is regarded as a signal favour. They also offered to introduce me into the club here; -- an honour, however, which I declined. It is purely a gambling club, which a man should beware of in England more than in any other country. It may be regarded as a part of the national costume, and highly characteristic of the general tradesman-like spirit, that beforehand all advantages are fair; but that after a bet is once taken, though often amidst the greatest hurry and confusion, it is scarcely ever disputed. On the other hand, a man who has lost more than he can pay, before reckoning-day becomes invisible—that is, commits an act of bankruptcy, and betakes himself to the continent, either for ever, or till he can pay.

"Of all offences," we are afterwards told, "against English manners which a man can commit, the three following are the greatest: to put his knife to his mouth instead of his fork; to take up sugar or asparagus with his fingers; or, above all, to spis anywhere in a room. These are certainly laudable prohibitions, and well-bred people of all countries avoid such practices, though even on these points manners alter greatly; for Marshal Richelieu detected an adventurer, who passed himself off for a man of rank, by the single circumstance of his taking up olives with his fork, and not with his fingers. The ridiculous thing is the amazing importance which is here attached to them. The last-named orime is so pedantically proscribed in England, that you might seek through all London in vain to find such a piece of furniture as a spitting-box. Dutchman, who was very uncomfortable for the want of one, declared, with great indignation, that an Englishman's only spitting-box was his stomach. These things are, I repeat, more than trivial; but the most important rules of behaviour in foreign countries almost always regard trivialities. Had I, for example, to give a few universal rules to a young traveller, I should seriously counsel him thus :- in Naples, treat the people brutally; in Rome, be great many; and in England, don't spit. cording to their representation of the matter, With these rules, the young man would get on had not cut a very heroic figure. They made very well."

We daresay, our excellent comedian, Liston, would be very well pleased (snug as he is) if the prince would make proof of the first part of the following representation—the latter part is an idle story. "The Haymarket," he says,
"I lately visited, when the celebrated Liston enchanted the public, for the hundred-and-second time, in Paul Pry, a sort of foolish lout. The actor, who is said to have made a fortune of six thousand a-year, is one of those whom I should call natural comic actors, of the same class as were Unzelmann and Wurm in Berlin, and Bösenberg and Döring in Dresden; men who, without any profound study of their art, excite laughter by a certain drollery of manner peculiar to themselves, and an inexhaustible humour, qui coule de source; though frequently in private life they are hypochondriacal, as is said to be the case with Liston."

"The notorious Madame Vestris (he con tinues), who formerly made furors, was also She is somewhat passes, but still very fascinating on the stage. She is an excellent singer, and still better actor, and a greater favourite of the English public even than Liston. Her great celebrity, however, rests on the beauty of her legs, which are become a standing article in the theatrical criticisms of the newspapers, and are often displayed by her in man's attire. The grace and the exhaustless spirit and wit of her acting are also truly enchanting, though she sometimes disgusts one by her want of modesty, and coquettes too much with the audience. It may truly be said, in every sense of the words, that Madame Vestris belongs to all Europe. Her father was an Italian, her mother a German and a good piano-forte player, her husband of the illustrious dancing family of France, and herself an Englishwoman-any chasms in her connexion with other European nations are more than filled up by hundreds of the most marquant lovers. She also speaks several languages with the utmost fluency. In the character of the German 'broom girl,' she sings

'Ach, du lieber Augustin, with a perfect pronunciation, and with a very piquant air of assurance."

The subjoined remarks on our newspapers deserve a place :--

"A strange custom in England is the continual intrusion of the newspapers into the affairs of private life. A man of any distinction not only sees the most absurd details concerning him dragged before the public-such as where he dined, what evening party be attended, and so forth (which many foreigners read with the greatest self-complacency); but if any thing really worth telling happens to him, it is immediately made public without shame or scruple. Personal hostility has thus beau jeu, as well as the desire of making profitable friends. Many use the newspapers for the publication of articles to their own advantage, which they send themselves. The foreign embassies cultivate this branch with great assiduity. It is easy to see what formidable weapone the press thus furnishes. Fortunately, however, the poison brings its antidote with it. This consists in the indifference with which the public receives such communications. An article in a newspaper, after which a continen-tal would not shew himself for three months. here excites at most a momentary laugh, and the next day is forgotten. About a month ago, had not cut a very heroic figure. They made the most offensive remarks, and drew the most mortifying inferences as to the calibre of his valour; and all this had not the smallest perceptible effect in disabling him from presenting himself in society with as much ease and un-concern as ever. They have tried to give me, too, a coup fourre__

But I have served under an old soldier, and learned from him always to have the first and loudest laugh at myself, and not to spare an inoffensive jest at myself and others. the only safe way of meeting ridicule in the world: if you appear sensitive or embarrassed. then indeed the poison works; otherwise it evaporates like cold water on a red-hot stone. This the English understand to perfection."

We differ so much from the writer in his critiques upon Braham and other performers, that we pass them over, and select as our next quotation a more general notice of the stage.
"The most striking thing to a foreigner in English theatres, is the unheard-of coarseness and brutality of the audiences. The consequence of this is, that the higher and more civilised classes go only to the Italian Opera, and very rarely visit their national theatre. Whether this be unfavourable or otherwise to the stage, I leave others to determine. English freedom here degenerates into the rudest license, and it is not uncommon, in the midst of the most affecting part of a tragedy, or the most charming 'cadenza' of a singer, to hear some coarse expression shouted from the galleries in stentor voice. This is followed, according to the state of the bystanders, either by loud laughter and approbation, or by the castigation and expulsion of the offender. Whichever turn the thing takes, you can hear no more of what is passing on the stage, where actors and singers, according to ancient usage, do not suffer themselves to be interrupted by such occurrences, but declaim or warble away, comme si rien n'était. And such things happen not once, but sometimes twenty times, in the course of a performance, and amuse many of the audience more than that does. It is also no rarity for some one to throw the fragments of his gouté, which do not always consist of orange-peels alone, without the smallest ceremony, on the heads of the people in the pit, or to shail them with singular dexterity into the boxes; while others hang their coats and waistcoats over the railing of the gallery, and sit in shirt-sleeves; in short, all that could be devised for the better excitement of a phlegmatic Harmonie Society of the workmen in Berlin, under the renowned Wisotsky, is to be found in the national theatre of Britain. Another cause for the absence of respectable families is the resort of hundreds of those unhappy women with whom London swarms. They are to be seen of every degree, from the lady who spends a splendid income, and has her own box, to the wretched beings who wander houseless in the streets. Between the acts they fill the large and handsome foyers, and exhibit their boundless effrontery in the most revolting manner. It is most strange that in no country on earth is this afflicting and humiliating spectacle so openly exhibited as in the religious and decorous England. The evil goes to such an extent, that in the theatres it is often difficult to keep off these repulsive beings, especially when they are drunk, which is not seldom the case. They beg in the most shameless manner, and a pretty, elegantly dressed girl does not disdain to take a shilling or a sixpence, which she innatural; in Austria, don't talk politics; in the papers made themselves extremely merry to take a shilling or a sixpence, which she in-France, give yourself no airs; in Germany, a about the duel of a noble lord here, who, as stantly spends in a glass of rum, like the meanest England, where the highest dramatic talent of the country should be developed; where immortal artists like Garrick, Mrs. Siddons, Miss O'Neil, have enraptured the public by their genius, and where such actors as Kean, Kem- pas dire mesquinerie), and on some solemn ocble, and Young, still adorn the stage. Is not casion received a snuff-box, with the portrait of this—to say nothing of the immorality—in the highest degree low and undignified? It is with very small paltry diamonds. Shortly afwholly inconsistent with any real love of art, or terwards, one of his colleagues asked him to conception of its office and dignity. The turbulent scenes I have described above scarcely ever arise out of any thing connected with the performance, but have almost always some source quite foreign to it, and no way relating to the stage."

Speaking of Figaro at Drury Lanc, we have some observations which shew what foreigners think of our mode of adapting their operas, and of our musical qualities.

"What was my astonishment (he exclaims) at the unheard-of treatment which the master- Bury : work of the immortal composer has received at English hands! You will hardly believe me when I tell you that neither the Count, the Countess, nor Figaro sang; these parts were given to mere actors, and their principal songs, with some little alteration in the words, were sung by the other singers; to add to this, the gardener roared out some interpolated popular English songs, which suited Mozart's music just as a pitch-plaster would suit the face of the childrens' dresses, presented no other colour. Venus de' Medici. The whole opera was moreover 'arranged' by a certain Mr. Bishop (a circumstance which I had seen noticed in the bill, but did not understand till now,)-that is, After I had been there some time, the celeadapted to English ears by means of the most brated bookseller C- entered. This man tasteless and shocking alterations. The English had made a fortune by Walter Scott's novels. national music, the coarse heavy melodies of which can never be mistaken for an instant, has, to me at least, something singularly offensive; an expression of brutal feeling both in pain and pleasure, which smacks of 'roastbeef, plum-pudding, and porter.' You may imagine, therefore, what an agreeable effect these incorporations with the lovely and refined conceptions of Mozart must produce. Je ny pourais tenir — poor Mozart appeared to me like a martyr on the cross, and I suffered no less by sympathy. This abominable practice is the more inexcusable, since here is really no want of meritorious singers, male and female; and, with better arrangement, very good per-formances might be given. It is true, even if the stage were in good order, a second Orpheus would still be required to tame English audiences."

We have great pleasure in quoting here a very just and judicious compliment paid to a distinguished character, who has very lately left us_to return, we trust, within a few months, to a station which he supports with princely splendour, and adorns with the most grateful courtesy.

"I often dine at Prince Esterhazy's, who exhibits a perfect model to diplomates how dignified représentation may be combined with agreeable facile manners; and how a man may please every body, if he understands the art of placing himself à sa portée, yet without suffering his own dignity to be forgotten for an instant, un vrai Seigneur, such as are every day becoming rarer. Never, too, did a foreigner succeed so perfectly in England; and yet, most assuredly, without the slightest concession to English arrogance. This implies infinite tact; the lighter, more vivacious character of a South beggar. And these are the scenes, I repeat, homie; the whole backed and set off by a

We annex two amusing anecdotes connected with diplomacy:

"Count H-- was ambassador at a German court renowned for its economy (pour ne shew him his present. 'Vous ne trouverez pas le portrait ressemblant,' said the Count, giving him the snuff box,—'mais les diamants.'"

"A diplomatic writer, who passed as anthority in the time of Louis the Fourteenth, concluded a treatise on the great privileges pertaining to foreign envoys, with the following words:- 'mais des qu'un ambassadeur est mort. il rentre dans la vie privée.' "

Our literary friends will laugh at the blundering in the following mention of Lady C.

"In the course of the evening I made a more interesting acquaintance than I expected on the staircase, (I could get no further,) in Lady C___B___, who has some reputation as an authoress. She is the sister of a duke, and was a celebrated beauty. The next morning I called on her, and found every thing in her house brown, in every possible shade; -furniture, curtains, carpets, her own and her The room was without looking-glasses or pictures, and its only ornaments were casts from the antique.

though, as I was told, he refused his first and best, Waverley, and at last gave but a small sum for it. I hope the charming Lady C-B- had better cause to be satisfied with him. I thought it discreet to leave her with her man of business, and made my bow.

The next passages, with which we conclude, are, perhaps, equally correct, i. e. a mixture of truth and mistake.

" I lately read a moving instance of conjugal affection in the newspaper: The Marquess of Hastings died in Malta; shortly before his death he ordered that his right hand should be cut off immediately after his death, and sent to his wife. A gentleman of my acquaintance, out of real tenderness, and with her previously obtained permission, cut off his mother's head, that he might keep the skull as long as he lived: while other Englishmen, I really believe, would rather endure eternal torments than permit the scalpel to come near their bodies. The laws enjoin the most scrupulous fulfilment of such dispositions of a deceased person; however extravagant they may be, they must be executed. I am told there is a country-house in England where a corpse, fully dressed, has been standing at a window for the last half-century, and still overlooks its former property."

I saw him in October, and found him, even then, the shadow of the robust stately man whom I had formerly so often seen at Lady L.'s, and at his own house, where six bottles of claret after dinner scarcely made a perceptible change in his countenance. She is now honoured by the Arabs a a prophet, lives with all the state of a nativ princess, and seldom allows Europeans to se her. After a great deal of trouble, Captai gained access to her. "What contributes much to the 'dulness' of English society, is the haughty aversion which Englishmen (note well, that I mean in their own country, for 'abroad' they are ready enough to make advances) shew to addressing an unknown person; if he should venture to address them, they receive it with the air of an insult. They sometimes laugh at themselves for this singular incivility; but no one makes the least attempt to act differently when an opportunity offers. There is a story that a lady saw a man fall into the water, and earnestly entreated the dandy who accompanied her, and who was a notoriously good swimmer, to save his life. Her friend raised his lorgnette with the phlegm indispensable to a man of fashion, looked earnestly at the drowning man, whose head rose for the last time, and calmly replied, 'It's impossible, madam; I never was introduced to that gentleman."

From these selections it may be guessed that this is a gossiping volume, well fitted to dissipate the ennui of a tedious hour. We have not followed the author in a tour, during which he describes many of our show-houses and grounds; such as Blenheim, Eaton Hall, Stowe, Kenilworth, Warwick Castle, &c. &c., for there is nothing very original in this guide-book sort of journal. To the fourth and concluding volume we shall probably pay our devoirs next Saturday: in the interim, we would again recommend the present to the lovers of light reading, as an agreeable production.

Memoirs of Great Military Commanders. By G. P. R. James, Esq., author of "Richelieu," &c. &c. 3 vols. 12mo. London, 1832. Colburn and Bentley.

THE lives of "great military commanders' would indeed be a valuable acquisition to lite rature. But where are we to look for the highly gifted individual capable of such an undertaking?-one who should make the lives of these heroes not the mere narrative of sanguinary mélées, but who would paint the deeds of the illustrious dead for the advantage and instruction of the living, and who, like the traveller Bruce. had rather explore the sources of action than loiter to describe their tumultuous flow? What a variety of accomplishments must concentre in the man who should be fortunate enough to produce such a history!—A thorough know-ledge of the theory and practice of ancient and modern warfare, profound judgment, the acute penetration of the worldly, the research and labour of the studious, a style in composition simple and vigorous, neither laden with ornament nor obscured by ambiguity, and, withal an earnest ambition to elevate military science and its professors to that consideration which they have been hitherto denied. The applause of the world is a faithful attendant upon success; but little estimation is bestowed on the labours of mind and body which have led to such an issue; nor are the accidents, which set human calculations at defiance, often admitted to account for the disappointments they occasion. The career of the military com- them through their narrow and tortuous course. have completely prevented its effect, by putting dled for his own Son, and wee to the man who mander, perhaps more than any other, is judged After having conducted several embassies with ambition to the height we have described; but, selves puzzled to discover the particular class of readers for whom they are designed. They afbe said to be properly addressed to the young. Mr. James, so able in other parts of literature, is so unacquainted with military affairs, that no use is made of even the commonest technical terms; and we read of troops being destroyed piece-meal; an army pausing, in lieu of halting; fords being destroyed; "archers forming a rampart of stakes," for chevaux de frise, or palisades; and of " Eugene being hampered by raw forces under his command, and a raw monarch commanding him," &c. &c. &c. In pursuance of our duty, and in corroboration of our judgment, we extract the following from the third page of the first volume, as a specimen of the numerous such faulty passages in the work :-- " Many of these were executed either at Shrewsbury or London; and the Earl of Northumberland, the chief support of the rebellion, made his peace for the time to meditate his rebellions." Another, from the life of the Duke of Alva, in the same volume: " Yet, as he left the low countries, none said, God bless him! and it is probable that not one soul accompanied his journey with a good wish.' In one portion of the life of Cromwell, we find Ireton described as "deceitful, and the slave of the usurper's greater cunning;" while, in another, we are informed that there is " every reason for believing that he was a sincere and steady republican, and would have strenuously opposed the ambitious views he entertained."

We will not fatigue our readers by multiplying such quotations; indeed many have the appearance of being careless translations. Among the inaccuracies, Gonsalvo de Cordova is stated to have first drawn his breath in the city of that name, whereas he was born at a small town named Montilla, in the vicinity; the Bay of Gabarus, where Wolfe landed, is not seven miles, much less seven leagues, from Louisburg. Several proper names are mispelt; and there is a strange application in various places of the epithet "unhappy," for unfortunate or unsuccessful.

> Having given a general opinion of the work ve must still admit that there are shades of difference discoverable, from which a sense of justice induces us to extract. The lives of which have been treated with the most success; and the following passages, relating to the conqueror of Monjuic, will be perused with interest:-

"Peterborough was now restored to high favour, and his talents were employed in various ways; but he never returned to the command which he had formerly enjoyed. Though still holding military rank, he was now chiefly occupied in diplomacy, and shewed himself as active and skilful a tactician in the cabinet as in the field. His first embassy was to the court of Vienna in 1710, and then to Turin and several other Italian courts. With his negotiations, however, we have less to do here than with his military actions; and, indeed, the very character of such transactions involves them in so much obscurity, that much difficulty and little pleasure occurs in the endeavour to trace complete success, he returned to England, and was appointed Colonel of the royal regiment of Horse Guards and General of Marines; and on the 4th August, 1713, was installed at Windsor as Knight of the Garter. He did not remain long in England, but was soon despatched as ambassador extraordinary to the King of Sicily, and appears at the same time to have been charged with various other negotiations with the Italian princes through whose states he passed. Shortly after (in 1714), as if it were determined that his appointments should never have any reference to his former services, he was named Governor of Minorca. How long he held this appointment, I do not know; but probably only for a short time, for 1719 he is found travelling on the continent, mingling gratuitously in diplomatic affairs, and aiding to bring about one of the greatest and most beneficial events which had occurred in Europe for some time. Although scarcely connected with his life as a great commander, this transaction must not be passed over, even in this very brief and imperfect sketch of the life of Peterborough. A needy Italian adventurer, of the name of Alberoni, had raised himself, by bold speculations and cunning intrigue, to the highest ranks of the church and state. From the petty station of a poor priest, the son of a gardener of Placentia, he had obtained the crimson, and the office of prime minister at the court of Madrid; his cunning governed a king and a kingdom, and his policy convulsed a world. During his administration of the affairs of Spain, his mind, continually occupied with vast and extraordinary schemes, far beyond the power of the country he governed to effect, kept Europe in continual agitation and alarm, without producing any thing but defeat and disgrace to the Spanish monarch. His influence with Philip V. and his second queen, a niece of the Duke of Parma, was unbounded; and from a conviction that his removal was absolutely necessary to the tranquillity of Europe, England and France united together to work his fall. The Duke of Orleans, at that time Regent of France, one of the most extraordinary men of the day, from the combination of talents and vices which his character displayed, was entrusted with the execution of the design; and it was determined that peace should only be granted to Spain on the condition of the total banishment of Alberoni from that country. The first means taken were to induce the confessor of the Spanish monarch to join in working the disgrace of the minister, which was effected without difficulty; and the justice induces us to extract. The lives of king's partiality, which had been shaken by Turenne, Condé, and Peterborough, are those the failure of all Alberoni's vast plans, and the ruinous effects of his counsels, was now totally alienated by the insinuations of Aubenton. Still the strongest prop to the cardinal's power remained, as long as he retained his influence over the queen, for the personal inclinations of Philip were bent to those of his wife. This princess owed her elevation from a petty Italian sovereignty to the throne of Spain, in a great degree to Alberoni; and, notwithstanding the ill-success which had attended his vast efforts, and the misfortunes he had brought upon Spain, she continued to regard him with gratitude and esteem. It became necessary, therefore, to the views of England and France, that the queen should be convinced that the safety of her husband's dominions depended upon the removal of Alberoni, which could only be done through the medium of her uncle, the Duke of Parma. The least rumour of the negotiation would the obnoxious minister upon his guard; when the means of preventing the communication between the queen and her uncle would easily have been obtained. A formal embasey to Parma, therefore, was out of the question : and the regent sought anxiously for some one to whom he might trust the private management of so delicate a transaction. Lord Peterborough happened to be at that time in Paris, and the Duke of Orleans applied to him, explaining his object and desiring his assistance. The earl at once undertook the commission; and as there was nothing wonderful in the journey of a man who was continually moving from place to place, the eyes of Alberoni's adherents were not particularly attracted by his progress from Paris to Italy. Travelling apparently for pleasure, he stopped for a few days at Parma, won over the duke to his design, and arranged the whole plan for carrying it into execution. Scotti, an envoy who had before been employed in Spain, was sent back to Madrid, and, notwithstanding Alberoni's jealous precautions, obtained a private interview with the queen, through the mediation of Laura Pescatori, who had been her nurse. It was now clearly shewn to that princess, that the fate of her husband and her husband's dominions, the safety of his crown, and the tranquillity of Europe, depended upon the fall of Alberoni; and no longer hesitating between her duty and her inclination. she withdrew the support which had so long upheld the minister. The whole transaction had been conducted with such secrecy, that Alberoni had not the slightest idea of his approaching fate; he transacted business with Philip, as usual, before that monarch's departure for the Prado, and was next morning pre-sented with a royal decree announcing his dismissal, and commanding him to quit Madrid within eight, and Spain within one-and-twenty days. This was the last negotiation in which I find Peterborough taking any active part. Under George I. and George II. he remained General of all the Marine Forces in Great Bri. tain; but his public life was now closed, and he devoted himself to the enjoyment of private happiness. No man knew so well how to fill every moment; and in travelling through all the countries of Europe, mingling with eminent men in every nation and of every class. friendly to many, accessible to all, he passed the subsequent years till 1735. Through the greater part of his life he enjoyed uninterrupted health; but he was not by any means free from personal sorrows. The loss of his two sons, who died some time before their father, after having distinguished themselves in the service of their country, was a severe affliction to Lord Peterborough. The death of their mother also, his first wife Carey, daughter of Sir Alexander Fraser, interrupted his domestic happiness in 1709; but he afterwards formed a connexion which, though its character was for sometime doubtful, tended much to his comfort in afterlife. This was a private marriage with the celebrated Anastasia Robinson, a public singer. Her station in society, and the secrecy which his pride enjoined, at first caused the lady to be considered as his mistress, though the delicacy and respect with which he treated her on all occasions could only be paid to acknowledged virtue. She bore the inconveniences and uncomfort to which the concealment of their marriage subjected her, with the most exemplary patience, and by her kind counsels and gentle management, softened the advance of age, and alleviated the approach of sickness and infirmbest friend' - sufficiently shewed his appreciation of her character; and towards his latter years his conviction of her excellence overcame the weak pride which had produced a private marriage, and gave him strength to do full justice to her reputation. The matrimonial ceremony was not in those days guarded by so many forms as at present; and though to all who knew him his asseveration was sufficient to establish the fact of his marriage, yet the legal proof was obtained with difficulty, from the death of the clergyman who had officiated. Under these circumstances he was remarried at Bristol; and his wife, who survived him, was placed in that rank of society to which she was properly entitled. His great delight in his retirement was in laying out his grounds, and in embellishing his property; and even age took nothing from the sprightly cheerfulness of his disposition, or his fondness for society. Courting the company of men of learning and men of wit, he was himself courted; and a thousand anecdotes have been handed down, by many a celebrated writer. of the talent, the generosity, and the singularity of the Earl of Peterborough. To the circumstances thus recorded no particular date can be assigned, as the authors from whom we derive them have not fixed their period. While in Spain, he is said to have paid the English troops himself, on the failure of remittances from the British government; and I think it is Voltaire who relates an anecdote of him. which shows the reliance that even strangers and enemies placed in his chivalrous honour. On the attack of one of the towns in Spain, while he was treating with the governor at one gate, a body of the allies forced their way in at another, on the opposite side. The governor for a moment thought himself betrayed. 'Your only resource,' exclaimed Peterborough, 'is to suffer my troops to enter: we will make the others depart, and I will return and grant you the same terms, or place you in the same condition as you were before.' The governor consented: the English general entered the city, obliged his allies to retreat, and returning to the spot where the treaty had been interrupted, signed the convention as it had been at first proposed. Another anecdote, more to the credit of his wit than his good feeling, is told of him, connected with the rivalry which sprang up between him and the Duke of Marlborough. At the time that nobleman was in disgrace, the popular mind had been greatly irritated against him; and as Peterborough was passing along the street, in the midst of an excited crowd, he was pointed out as the great general. The multitude immediately conceived him to be the Duke of Marlborough, and proceeded to insult him with the indiscriminate haste with which the vengeance of a crowd is generally expressed. Nothing that Peterborough could say would persuade them of their mistake, till at length he exclaimed, Gentlemen, I can convince you by two reasons that I am not the Duke: In the first place, I have only five guineas in my pocket; in the second, they are very much at your service. The mob shouted loudly, received ty himself, he was also, by his singularities, the

Every one must confess th gratification and corruption are two distin terms; nay, at worst, many good men he that, for a good end, some very naughty me sures may be made use of. But, sir, I mu give you some good news in relation to myse because I know you wish me well. I am cun of some diseases in my old age, which w mented me very much in my youth. I w possessed with violent and uneasy passion such as a peevish concern for truth, and a san love of my country. When a Christian price preached against the spirit of the Gospel-when an English judge determined again Magna Charta—when the minister act against common sense, I used to fret. Nor sir, let what will happen, I keep myself i temper. As I have no flattering hopes, so banish all useless fears. But as to the thing of this world, I find myself in a condition be yond expectation; it being evident, from a lst parliamentary inquiry, that I have as mucready money, as much in the funds, and great a personal estate as Sir Robert S-tt-1 If the translator of Homer find fault with thi unheroic disposition; or, what I more fear, the Draper of Ireland accuse the Englishma of want of spirit, I silence you both with on line out of your own Horace-Quid to exempt juvat spinis e pluribus una? for I take th whole to be so corrupted, that to cure any par would be of little avail. This would readily and clearly indicate where Howards, and Villiers, and Percys, and Talbots, and Russells, or where other races, held these high titles.

Essays, Moral and Political. By R. Southey, LL.D. Now first collected. 2 vols. London; 1832. Murray.

UNLESS we go upon the principle that politics and morals are inseparable, the word " moral' might have been omitted from the title-page these volumes being merely reprints of political articles of the Quarterly Review. As such, we have nothing to say in the way of criticism; the thorny and disputatious path of politics being one which we tread not. We have only one literary remark to make-we could wish that the two angry letters addressed to Lord Byron had not been republished. We are sorry to see this violent and unkindly spirit unsoftened even by the tomb.

The Population Returns of 1831, &c. &c. Large 8vo. pp. 100, with Maps, Tables, &c. London, Moxon.

TAKEN from the parliamentary returns, and skilfully arranged, this is a book of which every tolerable library should be possessed. The facts it unfolds are of great importance both to present politics and to future statistics.

History of the Jews in all Ages. By the Author of "History in all Ages." Pp. 567. London, printed for the Proprietors of Publications on Christian Principles; Hamilton, Adams, and Co.; Leeds, Knight.

Or the preceding work by this laborious com-piler we spoke in terms of much commendation, as a satisfactory outline of the universal subject which it embraced; and we are disposed to afford a similar praise to the present publica-tion. As a concise view of Jewish history, consistent with the data of the holy Scriptures. it is a volume of interest and usefulness, which may be advantageously read by all classes. With the preface we are not so well satisfied; the depreciation of Mr. Milman's work is not. in our opinion, borne out by facts; and at page x. there is almost a ludicrous phraseology, where the writer talks of anticipating "the decisive transactions of a judgment day." Decisive trans-actions, indeed!

The Shakespearian Dictionary; forming a general Index to all the popular Expressions and most striking Passages in the Works of Shake-speare, &c. &c. By Thomas Dolby. 8vo. and 12mo. pp. 367. Smith, Elder, and Co. A GREAT deal of pains has been taken with this work, and it contains a vast number of quotations, from a single line to fifty lines, of what may be termed the beauties of Shakespeare. These, too, may very generally be found under the selected synonym; but there are a thousand cases in which the sentiment A Rhyme Version of the Liturgy Psalms. could never be sought under the word assigned. Indeed it is impossible to construct any dictionary where this could be accomplished, except it were a complete verbal index-and even in this, without prodigious repetitions, there would be, we can truly say, that it is an excellent table-book, pleasing for reference, and interest-ing if merely taken up for its own sake.

Selections from the Prose Works of Robert Southey, LL.D., Post Laureate: chiefly for the Use of Schools and Young Persons. pp. 367. Moxon.

A WELL-chosen and delightful volume, containing some admirable extracts from one of England's best proce writers.

Selections from the Poems of Robert Southey. Pp. 373. Moxon.

WE cannot give the same praise to this work that we do to its companion; the selections appear to us to be any thing but well chosen. We never thought highly of Southey's comic powers, and "The Amatory Poems of Abel Shuffle. bottom" have now lost the little point they ever possessed; for the Della Cruscan school which they were written to ridicule, has, inwhich they were written to runcue, nas, indeed, "left but the name of its faults and its follies behind." We would gladly have seen their place filled by omitted favourites—the touching poem of "Father William," for example. The extracts from the long poems are, indeed, sending bricks as specimens of palaces; besides, the notes, for which there is here no space, are quite indispensable even for the very understanding of the text. Now that it is so much the fashion to re-publish, an edi-tion of Southey's works, in the Waverley form, would deserve a place in every library.

Green's Posms; chiefly occasional. pp. 77. THESE poems are more fit for the private circle than for publicity. The author, in one of his love-songs to Emma, is, however, guilty of a novelty; for he thus addresses her,-

"Dear heart of oak! my gallant girl!" Yet Emma, his chosen vessel, does not seem to be hard-hearted, either.

Weverley Novels, Vol. XXXIV. St. Ronan's Well, Vol. II. Edinburgh, 1832. Cadell. THE frontispiece to this volume, by R. Graves after Mulready, is, if not the best, one of the very best illustrations yet bestowed on this series: the characters of the minister of St. Rozan's and of Mr. Touchwood are admirably contrasted; the latter is perfect. The vignette by J. Wood, and engraved by W. Chevalier, is also a sweet composition. A volume of twice the price, containing these, would be a cheap purchase.

Whims and Oddities. By T. Hood. First and Second Series. London, 1832. Tilt. THE first and second series of these amusing papers being rolled into one, like Colman's comparison of the fat single gentleman, Mr. Hood has introduced them with a short preface, noticing that they constitute a fourth edition, and thus, whatever may hereafter befall him or them, they have at least shewn a horse-power, by leaving four imprints behind them.

ARTS AND SCIENCES. ROYAL INSTITUTION.

MR. FARADAY on recent experimental investigations relative to volta-electric and magnetoelectric induction. The subject here treated of forms a portion of the extensive researches lately communicated by Mr. Faraday to the Royal Society, in the Bakerian lecture; and, as we did not at that time report them, we shall on the present occasion briefly state the general results of the part now considered and experimentally demonstrated. After explaining his view of an electrical current, and its excitation by the voltaic pile; and after shewing a striking case of induction by electricity of tension, Mr. Faraday proceeded to give the proofs that a similar inductive action could be exerted by the voltaic current. Whenever two metallic wires are placed side by side, and a voltaic current passed through one of them, it instantly causes an electric current in the other wire, in the opposite direction to the exciting current. Although the exciting current be continued, the induced current exists, but for a moment, and is succeeded by a peculiar state in its wire, called the electro-tonic state. When the exciting current is discontinued in the first wire, an induced current is again produced in the second, in the contrary direction to that formed in it in the first instance, and the electro-tonic state ceases. Galvanometers were deflected and magnets made by these induced currents. When, instead of a voltaic battery and its current, a magnet is used as the inducing agent, Mr. Faraday found that electric currents could be generated by induction; therefore the great problem of obtaining electricity from magnetism, which to this time has remained unsolved, is now fully answered. A hollow helix was connected with the galvanometer, into which a cylindrical magnet was introduced, and the galvanometer became immediately deflected by the produced current: on the removal of the magnet, an electrical current in the contrary direction was effected. We may state the general result to be, that, whenever a piece of metal moves in the neighbourhood of a magnet, so as to act, the magnetic curves or electric current tends to be, or is actually, produced. After this demonstration, and in illustration of the early part of it, Mr. Marsh's powerful electro-magnet was shewn. This magnet at first would not lift a quarter of an ounce: a simple voltaic arrangement, contained in a vessel not holding more than a quart, was attached, and it immediately sustained weights amounting to between 300 and 400 pounds: when great care in applying the weights is taken, it has lifted 600 pounds. On removing a wire, so as to unconnect the voltaic plates, this power wholly disappears!

In the library were placed a great many curious productions, brought by Captain Lyon from the country of the Esquimaux, together with original drawings made by him; a fine proof of Martin's last engraving (Babylon); fossil-bones from Brighton, &c.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.

SEVERAL very interesting subjects came before the Society on Wednesday evening. A communication, which had been in the Society's possession a considerable time, received their Gold Isis Medal. It was a method of concentrating a ship's broadside. Two reasons created a hesitation as to the propriety of rewarding the invention in question: the one, be no connected exposition of fine and striking does credit to the heart and taste of the writer, as it was a warlike instrument, it more properly passages. Taking, therefore, Mr. Dolby's de- and nothing more. if it possessed the certainty of destruction which had been proved by several experiments, quære would it be politic to publish it, affording an enemy an opportunity of adopting the process against ourselves? The nature of the experiments unavoidably disclosed the detail of its construction; and the better sense of the Society prevailed, and rewarded an ingenious mechanic. A Gothic sash-window, peculiarly but very perfectly contrived, was also rewarded with the Society's Silver Isis Medal. A window, so constructed as not to shake by the effect of wind, a door-spring, and a pile-driver, were reported as undeserving of further attention.

In the class of agriculture, a most satisfactory and interesting paper was reported, from Mr. George Aikin, on the allotments of land made to the labourers in the parish of Toddington. Mr. A. observes, "that, in common with many other parishes, the quantity of agricultural labour has greatly exceeded the demand; and for want of a regular, well-managed plan for the employment of extra hands, the working poor have been turned into the high roads in gangs of twenty or thirty, not to work, but, apparently, to give them an opportunity of forming plans for midnight depredation." lotments of half an acre each, at the commencement of the plan, were made to six men, well recommended, and having large families.

The system succeeded so well, that the labourers became very importunate; and at Michaelmas 1830, a large field was divided among fortyone labourers, in pieces varying in size according to the ridges into which it was accustomed to be ploughed, giving the larger portions to those with larger families. The men, feeling that they were working for themselves, turned-to with a hearty good will, and their crops have proved abundant, particularly that of potatoes. The rules and terms upon which the land is held are few, good, and simple; and the proprietor, — Cooper, Esq. of Highgate, a wealthy landholder, at a time when the poorer classes of society are "heavily laden," may be very sincerely congratulated on his humanity. Many are placed in a comparative state of happiness to what they before experienced. Many others are anxious to obtain a similar grant, and the plan is rapidly extending.

In the class of polite arts, several designs for architectural buildings, ornaments, &c. were decided upon; and an ingenious and truly useful machine for drawing spiral lines, invented by Mr. Lane, was recommended by the committee with the liberal reward of the Gold Isis Medal and twenty pounds.

LITERARY AND LEARNED.

BOYAL SOCIETY.

H. R. H. the Duke of Sussex in the chair. A paper by Lord Viscount Mahon, F.R.S., on the quadrature of the circle and the trisection of the angle, was read, in which the noble author endeavours to prove, from geometrical reasoning, and by reference to the labours of Pappus and other ancient geometers, that there is a strict connexion between the modes of solution of each of these celebrated problems. The first part of a paper by Dr. Marshall Hall, on the respiration of animals, was read. The author in this part of his paper investigates the degree of connexion which subsists between the respiration and the irritation of the heart, in opposition to the views of Cuvier in his Anatomie Comparée, and more recently in his Règne Animal; and deduces the law, that the quantity of respiration is in the inverse ratio of the irritation. The writer described a new process which he had adopted for determining the chemical changes produced in a given quantity of air in which different animals had respired, and for ascertaining the correctness of Messrs. Allen and Pepys' researches, in which they conceived an equal portion of carbonic acid gas was produced for the oxygen absorbed; or those of other inquirers who conceived that, in addition to the carbonic acid gas, there was a free portion of oxygen. The instruments employed by the author were a pneumatometer and an aerometer.

We understand that, in order to testify the admiration felt by many of the Fellows of the Royal Society for the very able production of Mrs. Somerville, which we have already submitted in detail to the notice of our readers in anspices of the Duke of Sussex, Mr. Davies Gilbert, Mr. Lubbock, and other distinguished individuals, for a bust of this lady by Chantrey. which it is intended to present to the Royal Society, to be placed in its public meeting-room. Notwithstanding the high commendations which our first mathematicians have already communicated to Mrs. Somerville, we can scarcely conceive any circumstance to be more gratifying to her than this honourable testimony from the Fellows of the Royal Society.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.

Mr. Hudson Gurney in the chair .- The secretary read a further portion of Mr. Madden's paper on the game of chess, and particularly on the chessmen discovered at Lewes, one of the Western Islands of Scotland, giving a minute description of the carving, costume, &c. of the several pieces. Mr. M. observed, that the bishop, in the figure of a monk or priest, succeeded in the 12th century to a piece in the form of an elephant; but the name, bishop, does not occur earlier than the time of Elizabeth. This piece was in former times also called by different nations, the fool, and the prince; and in modern times it is represented with the mitre only, as the knight is by a horse's head, as an epitome of the whole figure formerly represented. The knights found in Scotland are represented on horseback, fully caparisoned, with pointed helmets, some with nose-guards, and pieces to preserve the ears, and long kite-shaped shields, having carvings very like armorial bearings. He described some of the pieces as warders, the predecessors of the rook or castle; these are in the form of an armed soldier on foot. This form is found described by the Icelandic writers only, as representing a centurion, and they have a name for the piece somewhat similar to the English name of rook; but Mr. Madden considers that the name rook is derived from a Persian word signifying a warlike adventurer.

FINE ARTS.

BRITISH GALLERY. [Third Notice.]

No. 17. Water-Carriers taking the Siestaa Scene in Madrid; No. 150. Donna Cande. laria. James Leigh. - The first of these works is placed at so great an elevation, that all we can say of it is, that it appears to be a rich and picturesque composition. The second exhibits much character, and is painted with great mastery of pencil, but is rather low in tone.

MIDDLE ROOM.

No. 220. The Comfort of Listening. R. W. Buss,- Mr. Buss has evidently had the old proverb, "listeners never hear any good of themselves," in his mind. He has made several good graphic hits, but we own that we do not consider this as one of his best.

No. 227. Covent Garden Market. J. F. Lewis. An old friend with a new face. What place is more intimately associated with all an old Londoner's most amusing recollections than Covent Garden? Much as the market has, no doubt, gained in convenience and comfort by its recent re-construction, it has lost sadly in picturesque interest. There is great cleverness in many parts of Mr. Lewis's performance, although it has too much of the thinness of a water-colour drawing, and is deficient in keeping and aerial perspective.

No. 244. Scene at Battersea. J. Stark .-One of those familiar and picturesque views how to invest with the best qualities of arttruth and effect.

No. 245. The Effects of Intemperance. T Webster .- If Mr. Webster were in the commission, he would evidently make a very active magistrate. To our knowledge, this is the second culprit whom he has placed in the pictorial stocks within a very short period of time. The present is a much larger and more important work than the former; it is full of entertaining expression, and is admirably painted.

No. 246. The Virgin, with the Infant Christ and St. John. Felice Schiavone.— Sweetly and tenderly executed, with Raphael-like composition and character.

No. 264. Landscape, with Beech Trees and Figures. F. R. Lee. Placed in a much better light than when at Somerset House, this noble and brilliant work must excite the admiration of all who behold it.

Nos. 265, 267. The Royal Procession on the Thames, Aug. 1, 1831. W. F. Witherington, A.R.A. Why were these two gay and beauful representations of the splendid spectacle to which they refer hung so low as almost to escape notice, and defy inspection?

No. 269. Return from a Masked Ball. T. Clater. Whether we consider this performance in its technical, or in its sentimental character, it is equally an object of interest; and if a piece of well-painted satin can give value to a work of Flemish art, surely the addition of mind to matter may claim higher distinction. Mr. Clater has represented, with great truth, the satiety, and languor, and rumination on the past, which generally follow the midnight revel; and the freshness and natural splendour of early morning, as seen in the horizon, contrast exceedingly well with the jaded forms. and artificial trappings, of the actors in the scene.

No. 282. Reading and Listening. T. S. Good. -Admirable, both in thought and in execution. A volume might be written on the advantages of being a good listener. Many a ninny has passed for a wise man; many an empty purse has been filled, merely by dint of patient, determined listening. There is no quality in society more productive to its possessor. Talk of wit? Nonsense! The witty man is feared and shunned; the silent listener esteemed and courted.

The last-mentioned work is in the centre of the mantel, and is surrounded by performances of a cabinet size, not less attractive in point of talent and interest. We must confine ourselves to the enumeration of some of these gems; viz. No. 277, The View, R. T. Bone; No. 278, Blatchington, Copley Fielding; No. 279, A View near Hampstead, J. Linnell; No. 280, Head of Sancho, No. 284, Head of Don Quixote, C. R. Leslie, R.A.; No. 281, Mole at Naples, G. Jones, R.A.; No. 283, Westminster Abbey, H. Wilson; No. 285, Portico of Octavia, Rome, G. Jones, R.A.; No. 286, View in Italy, W. Cowen; No. 287, View near the Head of Loch Tay, Copley Fielding; No. 288, Scene in Boccacoio, R. T. Bone; No. 289, Heath Scene, A. Vickers, sen.; No. 290, Beach Scene, W. Shayer, &c. &c. These, if not stars of the first magnitude, nevertheless form a brilliant constellation.

No. 303. The Larder. G. Lance.-There are people in the world who think that the objects here assembled are only good to eat; Mr. Lance has thought that they were also good to paint; and of this, as well as of all his other works of a similar kind, we may say, that "the power of colours can no further go.

No. 337. The Recruit. H. Liverseege. An fate of this young artist. The story is perspicuously and touchingly told; the tone of colour is pleasing; and the execution is unlaboured.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Select Specimens of the Edifices of Palladio; consisting of Plans, Sections, and Elevations, with Details of Four of his most admired Buildings at Vicenza. From Drawings and Measurements by F. Arundale. London, Taylor.

"So justly," says Mr. Arundale, in his preface to this elegant publication, " have the works of Palladio been esteemed by different nations, for the general harmony and beauty of their proportions, as to obtain for his style of architecture a name derived from its founder, and followers of the first rank of genius in the art he brought to so much perfection. Among these, none have better appreciated his peculiar excellencies than the leading architects of Great Britain, as shewn in the works of Jones, Wren, and Chambers, where we find examples of the Palladian style, which reflect credit on their taste and discrimination, in adapting to our English wants and feelings the results of his well-applied study of the antique. With a view of instituting a comparison between these works and those of their great prototype, the author has collected for illustration some of the finest specimens of Palladio's executed designs, which he selected during a recent tour, carefully giving the measurements of the different proportions in English feet, and also details of the various decorations of each edifice."

The buildings chosen for this purpose are, the Olympic Theatre, the Palazzo Chiericati, the Screen to the Sala della Ragione, and the Villa Capra (of which last, Chiswick House is an exact imitation). The plates are twelve in number, and are executed with great precision and beauty: the descriptions of them are drawn up with much perspicuity. Prefixed to the work (which is dedicated to Sir John Soane) are an Introductory Essay on the State of Architecture in Italy, from the time of Constantine until the sixteenth century; and a Life of Palladio, translated from the Italian of Milizia. We have seldom met with a publication better calculated to improve the architectural student.

The History and Topography of the United States of North America. Edited by John Howard Hinton, A.M. Numbers XXVI. to XXX. Hinton.

THE most striking plates in these Numbers are, "Interior of the Presbyterian Church, Savannah," "Capitol of Virginia, Richmond, " Military School, West Point, New York," and " City Hall, Augusta, Georgia."

Views, exhibiting the Exterior and Interior. and principal Monuments, of the very ancient and remarkable Church of St. Dunstan in the West, in the City of London. To which is added an Historical Account of the Church, by the Rev. J. F. Denham, B.A. Waller. ALTHOUGH this ancient edifice could never boast of much architectural beauty, yet the peculiarity of its position in one of the greatest thoroughfares of London, and other circumstances, have so associated it with the earliest recollections of every inhabitant of the metropolis, that, now that it has been swept away, we are glad to meet with these graphic memorials of its external and internal form, and of the various monumental and other ornaments with which it was decorated. The views are additional cause for regretting the premature five in number, and are neatly executed on stone by W. Gauci, from drawings by F. T. Bury.

THE MOSAIC PAINTING AT POMPEII. [Second Letter.]

I AM induced to add a few particulars to my first communication by the publication of an essay (of only 12 pages) by Professor Quaranta. In this essay, the description of the painting is accompanied with proofs, supported by passages from Diodorus and Curtius, that it must represent the battle of Issus. I pass over these, to extract a few sentences in which this celebrated antiquary gives an opinion of the merits of this unique work of art.

"The extreme delicacy of this work on marble far surpasses the celebrated mosaic of Palestrina, as well as that of Hadrian's Villa, which have hitherto been considered as the greatest wonders in this kind of work. Besides. what are four doves, some masks, and a few small figures, in comparison with a painting in which are represented twelve horses, a large warchariot, and twenty-two persons, more than half the natural size, without reckoning those that were on the left side, which is almost wholly destroyed? It is impossible to describe the consummate skill with which so many figures are arranged and grouped in this confined space, or the truth and correctness of the drawing, the distribution of light and shade, the effect of the colours, and scrupulous attention to the minutest accessories. Michael Angelo and Raphael would have been proud of the dying horseman; and Alexander's Bucephalus, the horses of the quadriga, the others that lie on the ground wounded, and especially the one rearing and fore-shortened, are drawn with a boldness' and truth in their motions and positions, which the greatest modern painters, Raphael not excepted, might envy.

I must not omit Professor Quaranta's remark, that the features of Alexander resemble the portraits we possess of him in bronze and marble, and on gems: to which the professor adds the interesting conjecture, that if we recognise the head of Alexander to be his portrait, that of Darius may probably be also his true portrait, which has been hitherto wholly unknown to us, and would therefore be an invaluable addition to ancient iconology. When I first saw this master-piece, the heads of Darius and some other Persians struck mesomuch, that I thought I had never seen any so perfect, - nay, that even the very finest of Raphael's could scarcely bear comparison with them. As a mere amateur, I did not venture to express so decided an opinion, and was much gratified at finding my ideas confirmed by such high authority as that of Professor Q. What a painting, or, at all events, what a cartoon, must that have been after which so admirable a work has been produced with bits of marble!

I am happy to inform the friends of art, that Professor Quaranta announces a more extensive essay on the subject, and which will shortly be published, accompanied with a copper-plate from Professor Marsigli's beautiful drawing of this mosaic-

BIOGRAPHY.

SKETCH OF JAMES HOGG, THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.

At the time when the Ettrick Shepherd is, happily for his present enjoyment, and, we trust, happily for his permanent interest, exciting so much of the attention and receiving the careses of all ranks in the London world, the following sketch of him can hardly fail to gratify our readers. We are indebted for it to Mr. John Mackay Wilson, himself a young author, and a candidate for some portion of the fame he has so honestly assigned to his fellow-borderer, "fast by the river Tweed." We have taken the liberty to prune some of its poetical imagery; in every other respect we think it reflects high credit on the heart and talents of the writer, a specimen of whose own poetry we also subjoin.—Ed. L. G.*]

JAMES Hogg, one of the most extraordinary individuals that has appeared in the literary world, was born on the 26th of January, 1771, in a wild pastoral region called Ettrick Forest, in the south of Scotland;—a region uneven, rugged, and romantic, -- occasionally beautiful, always imposing, and often untamable in aspect as the spirit of its early inhabitants. In this district, the father of our poet having been overtaken by unmerited misfortune, rented a very small farm; and its re-mote situation, with his humble circumstances, prevented him from being able to bestow any other education upon his children than such as himself or his excellent wife were enabled in the evenings to give. What, however, the good man wanted in wealth and literature was added to him in piety; and morning and night he endeavoured to impart it to his family, as they knelt together before the God of their fathers, in their clay-built temple among the mountains. While yet a rosy-headed urchin, our young poet was sent into the bosom of the silent mountains to watch a few cattle. There, buried in the poetry of haunted hills, away from human eyes and from human sounds, - while the lark poured down its tide of song amidst the pure sunshine around him, and the voices of the streams as they sang through the valleys arose upon his ear, like the hymn of the invisible spirits he believed to be hovering through the glens, -poetry became a portion of his nature and his soul; and long before he had penned a single line, it gushed from his full breast in thoughts too deep for words;—for the sublime or romantic poetry of nature, in its awful or living silence, steals out the young soul with magnetic influence in sympathetic rapture. He who is born in the midst of such scenes and is not a poet, must resist being one.

The little he ever knew, if he ever knew aught of penmanship, he had in a great measure forgotten, and at twenty years of age he was scarcely able to write his own name. Previous to this, he had composed many songs and hallads, which, as is generally the case, obtained him but little respect among the neighbouring peasantry; and although two of his employers, named Laidlaw, had an almost paternal care over him, yet the multitude of the wise men of the forest, like the mass of mankind, cared but little for having a dreaming, listless maker of rhymes in their employment. Sober - minded people, forty or fifty years ago, particularly in Scotland, looked upon rhyming as something that lay about midway between idleness and sin; and sober-minded people now look upon it much in the same light, with the exception that they substitute folly instead of sin. So much for the march of liberality.

Conscious, however, of the power which was possessed by the ardent and despised spirit within him, the Shepherd took his sheep and "Midnight.

The sea is silent, and the winds of God
Stir not its waters; on its voiceless waves
Thick darkness presses as a mighty load, Weighing their strength to slumber. O'er earth's
One louely star is watching; and the wind,
Benighted on the desert, howls to find
Its trackless path, as would a dying hound.
The thick clouds, wearied with their course all day,
Repose like shrouded ghosts on the black air. Repose like shrouded ghosts on the black air,
Or, in the darkness having lost their way,
Await the dawn i "Tis midnight reigns around—
Midnight, when crime and murder quit their lair—
When maidens dream of music's sweetest sound,
And mothers, weeping, breathe the yearning prayer.

his untutored efforts, with all their imperfections upon their head, and those of the printer and the printer's devil added thereto. were printed at his own expense. The germs of the genius since so generally confessed were there visible,- but no man read, bought, or spoke of them; and all that the poet gained by the publication, (if publication it could be called,) was having the honour of being made like unto many of his brethren pennyless by the experiment. He returned to the forest with his books, without fame and without money, to encounter the laugh and the jibe of the ignorant, and the reproof of the worldly.

The neglected strains of the Shepherd, however, fell upon the heart of a kindred spirit: and charmed by the sweet voice in the wilderness, the "Border Minstrel" visited the " Mountain Bard " in his mother's humble cottage. It was chiefly through this acquaintance with Sir Walter Scott, who amongst firm friends ranks with the firmest, that his next production, and his work on sheep, met with a degree of success which completely overthrew the philosophy of their author. Having obtained by their publication three hundred pounds, the Shepherd was like a bird escaped from its cage, trembling and ecstatic with the novelty of liberty, and proud of the new-found use of its wings, striking upon every thing, but resting upon nothing, and continuing its tumultuous flight, till it falls upon the earth, with panting breast and broken pinions. The ducal lord of the hundred hills, amidst which he was a dweller, was not a more wealthy man than James Hogg with his three hundred pounds. The very valleys where he had lately wandered a dreaming herdsman, were conscious of his elastic tread. Sirrah - his faithful colley - saw there was a change on his master, and perhaps Sirrah was sorry to observe the change, - for dogs are wise, wonderful creatures, and Sirrah was among the wisest and most wonderful. The three hundred pounds appeared inexhaustible as the treasures of the King of Lydia. Their possessor was overjoyed, enraptured. - he knew not whether he carried the earth, or the earth carried him. Nor is it a matter of wonder, that on one who had never possessed three hundred pence, the sudden and unexpected possession of such a sum should produce such feelings : - they did not argue so much against his judgment, as they proved the genuine simplicity of his character. In the glorying and fulness of his heart, he took two extensive farms, to stock and uphold which would have required a capital of more thousands than he had hundreds. And in a short time, his all being expended thereon, the inexhaustible sum was swallowed up like a snow-flake falling on the bosom of a river __ the farms passed from his hands, and the profits of his publication vanished

" Like the baseless fabric of a vision," and - left a wreck behind ! leaving him once more a pennyless man.

After battling through a season of buffetings, disappointments, and misery, tying up his worldly substance in a bundle, and throw ing his plaid across his shoulders, with no friend but the staff in his hands, he and bidding farewell to his native hills, the uneducated son of genius set out upon his pedestrian journey, to become a literary adventurer in the Modern Athens. There he pro- situation, its white walls peer over the alder-his menuscripts into Edinburgh together; and jected the bold and almost ridiculous design of an unlettered, self-taught shepherd forsaking the solitude of the wilderness, and becoming editor of a literary periodical in the metropolis of his native country. Wild as the project appeared, it was carried into execution, and for several months was as successful as any former publication of its class. After the failure of this publication, Mr. Hogg was seized with a long and severe illness; and his best and warmest friend at this period (if I remember his name aright) was a gentleman called Grieves, a hat-manufacturer on the North Bridge; and the testimony which the honest Shepherd bears to the kindness and brotherly affection of Sir Walter Scott, even at this time, when he, resenting an imaginary insult, spurned them with disdain, do as much honour to the worthy baronet's heart as his splendid novels do to his head. Through a sea of troubles, the Shepherd still steered onward in his literary career, until the publication of his master-work, the Queen's Wake — a poem which purchased for him a laurel torn by the strength of nature from the tree of enduring fame. He was, however, most cruelly deprived of the profits arising from the publication by a mercenary publisher.

> He was now universally regarded as a sort of literary prodigy, or a living illustration of the spiritually visible power of the mysterious quality which we call Genius. His fame having arrested the attention of the late Duke of Buccleugh, that nobleman presented him with a small farm near St. Mary's Loch; and upon such terms, to him and his heirs, that it may be considered as the Shepherd's own property. It is situated in the very centre of retirement, in the midst of a valley somewhat of a triangular form, through which runs the Yarrow. Nearly opposite what may be termed a mountain pass, which runs for about seven miles in an almost direct line between the Yarrow and the Tweed, a bridge is thrown over the former river, dividing the valley into nearly equal parts, which appear on each side about a mile in length. Here there is nothing striking in the character of the scenery. The surrounding hills, which are of no great height, possess no imposing features, and present only the bare green bosom of a pastoral district. Three farm steadings, a cottage, a humble schoolhouse, and an ancient ruin, are all that the eye meets with as being, or having been, the habitations of man. Around the farm-house farthest down the glen, are some half-dozen solitary-looking trees; the other, which is of a humbler description, and jutting over a gentle hill, overlooks the Yarrow, is Mount Benger. The cottage is a very small and a very clean public-house, kept by the wayside for the re-freshment of the occasional traveller. It is hereabout that his neighbours begin to style the Shepherd, Mr. Hogg, and speak of him only as a gentleman whom they respect and love. Farther distant from his residence, and for twenty miles round in every direction, I have found his appellation invariably is Hogg the poet; beyond this, and he receives his more universal title, the Ettrick Shepherd. The third farm-house, which lies about half a mile above the bridge, is Altrive, the present residence of the poet, and built at his own expense. It is erected on a gentle rising ground, with the Yarrow behind, and a considerable rivulet immediately in front. It is a comfortable white-washed cottage, from the door of which a rustic bridge is thrown over the rivulet; and although only a single story in height, from its grove with which it is surrounded as though it towered to a prouder eminence. It is a square. neat, commodious building, such as a poet's fancy might have fremed in a dream of contentment. So far as I could judge, the farm may contain about twenty-five or thirty acres, a considerable pertion of which is a peat moss. The landscape around is destitute of the bold, the romantic, or the varied, but it possesses a character of quiet secluded beauty, which, once seen, lives in the memory in a perfect form.

At a ruinous rent he took the adjoining stock-farm of Mount Benger, and held it for several years, but which, in the spring of 1830, involved him in unpleasant and painful difficulties.

The Shepherd has also the merit of being the original projector of Blackwood's Magasine," and is a prominent member of the clever coterie who have shone among its contrihutors.

In stature he is about five feet six. His person is round, stout, and fleshy, with a slight inclination towards corpulency. His usual dress is a gray, or rather what is termed a pepperand-salt-coloured coat, composed of cotton and woollen, and made wide and flowing, after the manner of a sportsman's, but longer than such are generally worn; with trousers of the same, and yellow vest, or, upon a gala-day, the gray trousers are exchanged for nankeen. His face is ruddy, healthy, good-natured, and stamped with unassuming modesty and simplicity. Yet, in his honest features, and simple manners, he is blind as a grave-stone who cannot perceive the presence of the silent and unpretending but proud consciousness - " I am the author of the Queen's Wake,

'the chief' 'Mang Scotia's glorious peasantry !'*

His eyes are of a bluish gray, laughing and lively. His brow, broad, open, and untouched by age, is still smooth; his hair is of a yellowish hue; he is active, strong-built, and athletic, and appears not less than ten years younger than he is in reality. As a poet, he stands among the foremost; and perhaps no writer ever exhibited more of what can only be described as natural genius. His muse is not of a kind that can grasp the universe, and overwhelm us with its power; but it plays round and round the soul, ever and anon truth, and tenderness. In his prose works he has been less successful; but his genius wanders through them like a fitful will-o'-the wisp; and if it sometimes leaves them dull and dark, it often illumines them with flashes of brightness. He is an indifferent farmer - a tolerable astronomer — as good an angler as a poet - an archer anxious to excel, but wide of the mark - a poor manager of the things of this world-an amiable man-a warm friendan affectionate husband - a fond father - too good a master: he is beloved by his neighbours, honoured by his country, and admired of all observers; he is a humble Christian; and a man who, if he has one, does not deserve an enemy.

Next to poetry, his highest amusement is the Border games — angling, wrestling, leaping, putting the bullet, throwing the hammer, curling, and archery; and at the meetings of the St. Ronan's Club the Shepherd may generally be seen, with his plaid girt around him, and a memorandum-book in his hand, acting not only as clerk, but as the presiding and inspiring spirit of these Scottish Olympics. As anglers, they exhibit as much muscular strength as the Devonian or Cornish wrestler, and infinitely more manly humanity, but scarce a particle of his science. In leaping, throwing the hammer and bullet, they yield to no similar society; while in archery they are certainly some cen-turies before any other, for in this art we are rather going from perfection than approaching it.

There are few points of resemblance between James Hogg and the Ettrick Shepherd in the " Noctes Ambrosiane." The form of expression is frequently his, but there the likeness ceases. The latter is an ideal creation of the highly gifted Professor Wilson, who is one of the few who love Poesy for the sake of poesy -- for the beauty of her countenance and the nobility of her soul. Such use of this name has been a subject of uneasiness o Mr. Hogg and of complaint in his family. The using of it was possibly like an affair of gallantry, begun in thoughtlessness, but which has been carried so far, and continued so long, that the connexion cannot be broken. inspired Shepherd is still in comfortable circumstances, but with the exertion of unwearied literary industry. They who can judge of him aright must see him, as I have seen him, im-ploring the blessing of Heaven upon his hospitable board; or with his family class around him-holding an infant school in the wilderness !-setting an example to all parents-with his son by his side, one young daughter between his knees, and the third clinging round his neck; while and pauses at intervals to gaze with a smile of pride and delight upon the scene, as they strive who shall repeat to him most perfectly their Sabbath-school tasks, and obtain during the week the reward of their preparation, in the fond caress and proud kiss of the father who bends over them in love. Tell us not to reverence the author, were he sublime as Milton and powerful as Byron-if his wife speak timidly in his presence or startle at his voice, or his children crouch at his glance like a hound that knows the whip of its master-if we cannot reverence the husband, the father, and the man; for these are the poetry of his hearth, the poetry of domestic life, the poetry of his heart and his home! Can the man be a poet where poetry flees from his fireside at his approach? If we admire the poetry of "the Ousser's Wake" or of "Kilmeny" we helped Queen's Wake," or of "Kilmeny," we behold that poetry in motion-we perceive its "local habitation and its name," in the little parlour of Altrive Lake.

"The mother wi' her needle an' her shears Gars auld class look amaist as weel's the new,"

CHOLERA MORBUS.

We take credit to ourselves, that throughout our lengthened discussions on the nature and characters of the much-dreaded Cholera, and in our numberless notices of works expressly devoted to the subject, we have never deviated from the utmost simplicity of fact and detail, nor have we ever, by the fear of party, or in a truckling spirit for momentary favour, sacrificed the expression of the internal conviction which we have obtained by experience and by thought. In the last Gazette, we noticed the reported arrival of this disease in the suburbs of this great metropolis, and we foresaw that (as, it is strange to say, occurred in all commercial towns where the malady has made its appearance) the severity of the losses and privations entailed by the quarantine regulations, which, the Borderers have no superiors; in wrestling as a matter of faith between countries, would ensue from a knowledge of this unfortunate circumstance, would lead to murmurs (to a certain extent justified), and perhaps, among a certain set, to a denial of the fact. In this great social centre, the ignoble spectacle of diversity of opinion, and opposition to the dictates of humanity, might have been anticipated to be enacted upon a large scale; even the élite of the profession are at variance as to the facts. and we contemplate these proceedings with mingled sorrow and anxiety. We cannot fail to remark, that those who have in this city denied the existence of any uncommon disorder, as Johnson, King, Uwins, Conquest, &c. have not seen the disease as it has now existed for nearly three months in the north, nor have they seen it here; while men of acute observation and sound judgment who have seen the malady here and elsewhere, declare its identity. If we decline being forward in the statement of our own opinion, it is because we are perfectly certain, as has been remarked on the arrival of the disease in Sunderland, that if a new and malignant disorder, which propagates itself slowly but surely, has not made its appearance in the neighbourhood of the shipping on the Thames, art and nature must quickly triumph over any severe malady which is but the false messenger of alarm, and health will be the harbinger of renewed commercial activity. If, on the contrary, this peculiar and fatal malady has, in its customary manner, engrafted itself among the crowded population of those vicinities. not the laborious discussions of the ambitious, the loud assertions of the interested, nor even universality of opinion, will effect the slightest deviation on the uncontrollable decrees of an Almighty Providence.

THE GARRICK CLUB PAPERS, NO. III.

Wz are glad to have it in our power to begin this paper with another of these admirable translations.

From the Caphori of Æschylus, called by the Germans the " Electra."

Chorus of Women, supposed to be Trojan Captives.

Here, from the palace, are we sent to pay
A funeral rits, move in funereal train,
Sisters! and let us join in some sad lay,
Beating our breasts—ah! wo is me, the pain
Of many a recent furrow, many a stain
Crimsons them yet—my heart but feeds on care,
Shall we for others mount, who weep in vain
For our lost country!—at that thought I bare
My bosom, rend my veil, and weep in my despair.

Antistrophe 1. Terror, accompanied by many a sound
Of fearful presage, many a fearful sight,
That hauns the guilty soul in slumber bound,
With hair erect, and ahrieks that well might fright
The queen, came howling, in the noon of night,
From his own deepest hell; and those who know To read the future, and interpret right Her dream, portend the wrath of those below, And hence the murderess feels a new and keener wo-

[.] We doubt this fact .- Ed. L. G.

Strophe 2.
What funeral lays can chase her dreams of night? What funeral lays can chase her dreams of night?
What lustral waters cleanse her guilty stain?
And how shall I perform the ungrateful rite?
Can all the perfumes that all lands contain,
Can all the waters of the earth or main,
Wash out that little spot, or heal that wound?
Fallen house! O race of Atreus, past your reign!
A darkness visible, darkness without a sound,
A dreariness of the grave, enwraps your palace round.

A drearmess of the grave, enwraps your palace round Antistrophe 2.

The majesty, the glory, and the power,
Of him who was the mind and car of all, the sway That once struck awe like Jove's, has had its hour.
A life of bliss would be divine: but say
What mortal here can count upon a day?
Yes, Justice reigns to vindicate man's right:
Some she cuts off at morning's opening ray—
Some tardier fate at evening's closing light,
And some at midnight's hour sink to eternal night.
Strucks 3.

Strophe 3.

A drop of blood sinks not into the ground— A drop of blood sinks not into the ground—
Indeibly it remains, and must remain,
And call for vengcance; grief that knows no bound,
And eating care, and unconsumed pain,
And sleep that finds no rest, shall she obtain,
That faithless one, that heartless parricide—
The joys of her adulterous bed are vain;
Not all earth's mingled streams, or ocean's tide,
Could wash away the blood in which her hands are died.

Could wash away the blood in which her hands are died.

Antistrophe 3.

Forced by a cruel fate, since that dread hour
When from my native home, a slave forforn,
I was delivered to a tyrant's power,
What have I known but sorrow? nor less I mourn
That all her acts of evil must be borne
Without a plaint—nay, I've been taught the art
Of smiling when my bosom swells with scorn;
Then, too, at times a bitter tear will start,
And in my cloak I hide the throbbings of my heart.

Our next introduction is (we believe) an unpublished production of one of our most popular poets.

Lines presented to a Young Lady, by Thomas Moore, Esq.

They tell me of an Indian tree They tell me of an Indian tree, Which, howsoe'er the sun and sky May tempt its boughs to wander free, And shoot and blossom wide and high, Far better loves to bend its arms Downward again to that dear earth, From which the life that fills and warms Its grateful being first had birth. Tis thus, though wooed by flattering friends, And fed by fame—if fame it be, This heart, my own dear mother, bends With love's true instinct back to thee.

Sayings in Conversation ._. " Did you see the abuse of you in a scurrilous Sunday paper last week?" said A. "No, and I never care for such things," replied L.; " for though a calf's tongue may be rough, it is but a calf's tongue after all."

"X. is so very close," it was observed. "he will squabble about a single farthing."

"That fellow *," said W., "with his princely fortune, is so over-burdened with wealth that he does not know how to spend it." "Yes," remarked J., "he is evidently living in a state of great pecuniary embarrassment."—
"Waiter, snuff the candles," exclaimed the same witty person; "these wicks are fortnights."

"How do you think Lacy has done the Devil, at Covent Garden?" asked one of a coterie assembled as usual at the Garrick after the play. "Why," replied the punster, "he has done like a very Greek—by shewing him-self to be quite a Lacy-demonian."

Buckle, the Jockey. "And is one Buckes dead ?"-Shakespeare.$ Yes, he has passed! his course is run-Dead beat, at last, old Buckle lies;

The origin of a striking passage in Macbeth.

† The individual to whom these lines were addressed, was for the first time separated from her parents; and the lines allude to the tender affection and yearning with which she spoke of her mother and home.

‡ The celebrated jockey, Buckle, died last week. Fifty years' experience proved him to be the best rider ever known; his last race was at the close of the Houghton Meeting, 1831, when he took his leave of the turf.—Newspapers.

He's done—ay, worse than done and done
Even at the worst implies.

Fleet as he was, more fleeting life, Though on the turf he galloy'd fast; Alas! to think how vain the strife!— Beneath the turf he's thrown at last.

His start was fair, the field was clear,
Yet he his distance could not save;
No winning post could he come near,
Nor hedge from that vile ditch, the grave. If sought he Epsom know we not,

Or sweats to match the jockey grim; Newmarket must bide man's old lot, And Buckle's tongue be lost to him.

Oft swifter than the breezy wind We've seen him in his pride of place; Now, e'en though heirs he has left behind, There is an end to all his race.

And lay old Buckle in the ground;
And lay old Buckle in the ground;
And pray that, in the balance weighed,
No ounce may he be wanting found.

DRAMA.

KING'S THEATRE.

THE announcement of " la Signora Contessa Lazise, her first appearance on any stage,' fill the part of Desdemona, in Rossini's opera of Otello, excited our curiosity a little; and some information we obtained as to the motives that had induced the attempt, disposed us not to be over critical, but to try to follow the example of Sterne's generous man, and "be pleased, we knew not why, and cared not wherefore." was on Saturday that the "Contessa" made her début; but we did not attend till her second appearance, on Tuesday night. Her face and figure being pretty, we were prepared for the utterance of some sweet, though perhaps feeble, notes, when lo! a shrill piercing voice, most distressingly out of tune, struck on our dis-mayed ears. However, after a little hesitation, we heroically resolved to sit out the whole opera. We did so, and arrived at the conviction that "la Signora Contessa" labours under that insurmountable obstacle to vocal excel-lence, a defective ear. The tendency to sharpness prevailed, more or less, throughout. The audience, however, appeared good-naturedly unconscious of this, though the effect of all the concerted pieces in which the prima donna bore a part may be readily imagined. It were idle to enter into particulars as to voice, style, &c., in the absence of the one thing needful, a true intonation. Signora Albertini, who played Emilia, appeared just tolerable in comparison with Desdemona. Signor Winter went through the part of Otello with much spirit and energy. The scenery was good; Mr. Mason manages this part of the business, at least, much better than his predecessors. The house was tolerably well filled, the boxes particularly so.

DRURY LANE. The Dæmon; or, the Mystic Branch.

COVENT GARDEN. The Fiend-Father; or, Robert of Normandy.

THE public prints have so drugged us with devils, demons, fiends, and such-like gentry, that we have come to a resolution, that the less we have to say about them, it will be the more agreeable. At Paris, where they go regularly mad at certain periods about something or other, the last, or nearly the last, fit has been brought on by an opera of Mayerbeer's, called Robert the Devil. Now, we in London being equally addicted to be crazy at second hand, and insane by imitation, have had a glorious theatrical race, who should be first and foremost in importing, travestying, hashing up, and dishing the said opera, for the entertainment and delight of all playgoers. The Adelphi took the lead, and made a hit of it. On Monday Drury Lane started, and on Tuesday Covent Garden followed; both depending on fine scenery, grand coups, machinery, the music, and the diablerie. The story is familiar to every body. Robert of Nor-mandy is the son of a devil, who had wheedled his fair mother into matrimony; and his affectionate papa is very anxious to lead him, through crime, to the inheritance in the lower regions, rather than suffer him to remain on earth in possession of his mundane dukedom. The poor fellow is sadly puzzled between his infernal and human natures; now inclining to the foul fiend, now leaning to virtue, inculcated by a damsel who had attended his mother on her death-bed, and brings him her last solemn admonition, to avoid the designs of her amiable consort. In the end he does baffle these paternal strategies; the sire sinks into his native fire; and the Princess of Sicily, loving and beloved, inflicts the happiness of marriage upon him who has just escaped a fate of another very frightful kind.

• We rather suspect this has been in print.

As comparisons are acknowledged to be odious, we abstain from instituting any between the rival devils, exorcised at D. L. by a Bishop, and arranged at C. G. by a Lacy. The music, to our taste, has little to strike you, either at the one house or the other; and the subject, treat it as you may, must, after all, clip too closely between the sublime and the ridiculous to possess permanent claims to rational admiration. As it is, it will be a grand spectacle to gape at for some weeks to come; the nuns will be resuscitated, to dance about like a multiplication of Tam o' Shanter's "cutty sark;" the splendid paintings of Stanfield (especially) and of the Grieves will delight the eye of the multitude; and the vocal talents of Braham, Inverarity, and Shireff, heard to great advantage in the one version, as are those of Phillips and Mrs. Wood in the other, will charm the ear in as far as the compositions entrusted to them will allow. Beyond and after this, Robert the Devil may go to the devil, or to the King's Theatre; whither (i. e. to the latter, only,) the higher orders will follow him; and we shall say, that in the present disordered state of the universe, it would be quite as well not to make so many mock hells upon earth.

VARIETIES.

Switzerland. - The Nestor of the Swiss literati, M. de Bonstetten, died on the 3d inst. at Geneva, after a short illness.

Correct!-We have frequently noticed the correct way in which the French newspapers translate English news: the following, from Le Globe, is fine ! - " Dans la correspondance particulière d'Irlande, le Courier fait mention d'un assassinat commis sur la personne du Voerend - Witty, ministre protestant de Golden, comté de Tipperary."

The Lady Chapel .- Proceedings at the Meeting on the subject of the Preservation and Restoration of the Lady Chapel, &c. a pamphlet published by J. B. Nichols; and a South-east view, on stone, of the same edifice, by J. Harris, and dedicated to Mr. Saunders; sold at a low price, are admirably calculated to keep alive the good feeling which has been excited in the public to save this noble relic from the spoliation to lits flavour distinguishable; and that the coffeewhich it was doomed. To both, every man of taste, every lover of the antiquities of his country, must wish extensive circulation; and to the object to which they are devoted, perfect success.

Fossil Elephant.—The bones of an enormous Mastodonte were found last July near the Mein, in Bavaria. It was at the depth of about twelve feet; and among the remains were fragments of a molar tooth weighing six pounds.

Bad Water. - The Royal Address of the Water-King of Southwark, a biting squib at the Southwark Water-works, is before us; and likely enough, in addition to graver arguments, to obtain public attention to the supply of pure water to the Borough, as well as to the rest of the metropolis. For a civilised and enlightened people, we surely allow many strange and offensive anomalies to remain long uncorrected in our system, since the very first want of the in-habitants of the capital itself is so utterly neglected.

Capt. Blaquiere: Mr. Kendrick.-We are sorry to learn that more than serious apprehensions are entertained respecting the fate of our old friend, Captain Blaquiere, the author of several valuable and interesting works,-Letters from the Mediterranean, Letters on Greece, &c. &c. Captain Blaquiere, it seems, sailed about fifteen months ago in a merchantvessel for the western isles, which, there is every reason to fear, has foundered at sea, since nothing of her or her unfortunate crew has since been heard of.—We have also to mention the recent death of Mr. Kendrick, the sculptor. Few young artists gave greater promise at the commencement of their career. carrying off all sorts of honours, and the prizes in competition for national monuments. Recently, however, Mr. K. lost much of his intellectual faculty, and has died in poverty at an early age.

Journalism. A subscription has been entered into in Paris for the purpose of distributing over France a hundred thousand copies of the Journal des Connoissances utiles, politique, agricole, et commercial; every monthly number of which contains thirty-two pages, or nearly four hundred pages a-year. Since the commence-ment of 1831 there have appeared in Norway twenty political or literary journals.

Arabian Method of making Coffee. — A bright charcoal fire was burning in a small stove. She first took, for four persons, four handsful of the small, pale, mocha berry, little bigger than barley. These had been carefully picked and cleaned. She put them into an iron vessel, where, with admirable quickness and dexterity, they were roasted till their colour was somewhat darkened, and the moisture not exhaled. The over-roasted ones were picked out, and the remainder, while very hot, put into a large wooden mortar, where they were instantly pounded by another woman. This done, Kamalia passed the powder through a camel's-hair cloth; and then repassed it through a finer cloth. Meanwhile a coffee-pot, containing exactly four cups of water, was boiling. This was taken off, one cup of water poured out, and three cups full of the powder, after she had ascertained its impalpability between her finger and thumb, were stirred in with a stick of cinnamon. When replaced on the fire, on the point of over-boiling, it was taken off, the heel of the pot struck against the hob, and again put on the fire. This was repeated five or six times. I forgot to mention she added a very minute piece of mace, not enough to make pot must be of tin, and uncovered, or it cannot form a thick cream on the surface, which it ought to do. After it was taken, for the last time, from the fire, the cup of water, which had been poured from it, was returned. It was then carried into the room, without being disturbed, and instantly poured into the cups, where it retained its rich cream at the top. Adventures of a Younger Son.

Intended Expedition to discover the Sources of the Nile. - A Frenchman, who has resided fourteen years in Egypt, has lately conceived a project which he is on the point of carrying into execution. He intends to set out for Cairo, and endeavour to penetrate as far as the sources of the White Nile, or to the eastern banks of the Lake Tchad. Not having sufficient funds to carry his plan into effect, he has written to Paris, where, subscriptions being opened, a considerable sum has already been collected. The king was the first who put down his name, and the Princess Adelaide has contributed a thousand francs: an unknown friend has sent the same sum. On the list of subscribers are the names of Count Alexander de Laborde, Jomard, Taylor, Walkenaer, &c. Other considerable donations have been received or promised, and there is every reason to hope that the necessary sum will soon be made up. Paris. Feb 18.

Discordance of Consonants. - Mathews, in his imitations, has made frequent and facetious use of the blunders to which Germans are liable in confounding v with f, and the Welsh in occasionally converting the same letter into b. Perhaps no phrase would be so totally perverted by the lips of a German as the mot of Charles III. of Spain on the climate of Madrid, which being seated on higher ground than any other capital in Europe, has great extremes of temperature:

Nueve meses de invierno, y tres de infierno.

At Madrid, who can hope or e'en wish to grow old? Such strange weather has fallen to her lot; For nine menths in the year 'tis hibernally cold, And for three 'tis infernally hot.

"What would the Welshman, with his b for o, make of our festive motto?" was asked at a college compotation. "Make of it? Why, improve the reading, to be sure: Dum bibimus, . hibamus.''

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

O'We had intended this week to give some farther interesting Information from Vienna and Berlin on the subject of Cholera (shewing, indeed, how nearly the disputations farce now playing in London has been already performed on the Continent); but having, at a late hour, received yet more recent intelligence, we are induced to postpone the whole till our next. In the meanwhile, we trust there will be no relaxation of government and medical vigilance: the positive arguments for this, are far dical vigilance: the positive arguments for this, are far more strong than the negative arguments for an opposite course; and even if we allowed that sinister views exaggerated some cases, surely it is equally just to believe that men piedged to a theory would be as ready to conceal as others to blazon this maidy. We are also obliged to make several Reports, &c. of Public Societies yield for awhile to more temporary matters.

L. H. inadmissible, both from subject and composition. The MSS. of the Poet's Death are left at our office for the writer.

The MISS of the average of the writer.

T. M. R. declined, with thanks.
M. A. B.'s lines, though pleasing, are inadmissible.
L. Z. ditto, from the subject. F. C. H. also declined, with thanks.

we thank a stude of the Old School, and win adopt as much of his advice as our plan permits. Logos, we fear, is too long;—at any rate, we think we might prefer his second proposed part to the first. We cannot resist the following:—

On a Fountain in a Grove

The loving heart can never more Forget, sweet fountain, thee! The stock-dove

The fir-tree groans,
Thy streamlet weeps,

The lover moans Oh, sacred sympathy!

D. H. F.,
A German, Teacher of his Native Tongue.

In a second note, the learned poet proposes to read, in the first line—

"Who-ever loved, will never more"—

Perhaps an improvement!—Ed.

AUTION.— The Publisher feels it AUTIUN.—The Publisher feels it necessary to call the attention of the Public to the fellowing announcement of his Genuine Edition of the Pilgrim's Progress, with Notes, Life, and Portrait of the Author;—an unprincipled "Bociety," calling itself "religious?" having airready committed a gross fraud on the public, by foisting upon them an inferior edition of their own, as having Woodcuts by Bonner, and being the edition advertised with hus name. This, perhaps, may account for their artist not having thought proper to append his name to his drawing (which do not exceed twenty):—at least, it is a very fair supposition.

"We should not render strict justice to Professor Cellerier, if we were not to add, that he has selected the most striking arguments, and expressed them in clear and perspicuous language; and that his Treatise is well calculated to confirm the faith of Christians, and lead them to study the Scriptures with sentiment of profound reverence, and with entire condence. In the elucidations annexed to his Discourse on the Old Testament, we have been particularly pleased with his chapters on the testimonies borne by modern discoveries in favour of the Mosaic chromoniesy—on some common mistakes in the mode of forming a judgment of that portion of the Bible—and on the divine plan manifested in the constitution and history of the Jewish nation."—

"Professor Cellerier has formed his work on a popular model.
His pages are entirely free from the affectation of learning; and readers who are not scholars, will find their way through the whole of them without stumbling upon any formidable array of strange letters, or being impeded by any niceties of critical disscretation. Intelligent readers will asiagn to the author the meridue to a writer, who, avoiding every unnecessary display of his isabourt to the cause to which it may be applied; and, without formally assuming the character of a controvertist, renders his labourts to the cause of truth in such a manner as to expose the temerity and folly of its opponents. He has produced a brief but afficient defence of the early books of the Jewish Scripof the Mosaic code, and the authenticity of the Jewish Scriptor, we have no work resembling that of Cellerier, the tranlation of which will meet an urgent want, and confer a signal

INLIBITAN RELIGION, in a Series of Letters from a Pather to his Sons.

By A. SENIOR.

"We must conclude with professing it to be our judgment, that the author has furnished the world with a noble approximation to what is greatly needed, namely, an introductory manual, which shall make our sons and daughters acquainted with the essential elements of their religion, without presenting it to their minds as a severe and oppressive task. The volume is broken up into the form of letters of a very manageable length, which may invite even a somewhat indolent reader to an occasional prosecution of the subject, and, almost impreceptibly, create an interest in it more lively and permanent, than could be accomplished by a work of more austere didactic formality."—British Critic, Jan. 1839.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

The Sacred History of the World, as displayed in the Creation and subsequent Events to the Deluge, attempted to be philosophically considered, in a Series of Letters to a Son. Sharon Turner, F.S.A. &c. 8vo. pp. 520. London, 1832. Longman and Co.

"To have any solicitude about criticism on the present publication, would be absurd and un-becoming on such a subject. Not a line has been written with any reference to human reputation; and if that had presented itself as the actuating motive to its composition, not a line ought to have been written on the themes of this work for the purpose of obtaining it. But it is the duty of every author, in all his publications, to execute every part with his best care and ability. He expects this attention from others, and should never be deficient in it in his own publications. This duty has not been neglected in the ensuing pages. In these it has been a constant endeavour to collect authenticated facts - to state them fairly - to reason correctly about them - to express the natural feelings which have arisen as they were contemplated - and to make the general composition perspicuous, readable, and, if possible, not uninteresting. The first wish was to be serviceable to those in whose welfare the author is more immediately concerned. The larger hope has been added to this, that what should eventually be useful to them, might not be unacceptable to others. We have all arisen to sentient being, in the mighty system of which we are a part. Progression and happiness are desired and pursued, and are attainable by all. The varying ocean of human life is the present scene, in which these are to be acquired, so long as we remain in it. Here, also, we are to fit and prepare ourselves for securing the continuation of these blessings, in the unknown regions of ethereal space, into which we are all passing. The Lord of this World is the Sovereign of every other; and this consideration The Lord of this World is the Sovemakes it important to us to gain the fullest knowledge of His mind, ideas, and feelings, that we can obtain from His creations around us, and from all the sources through which He has communicated them to us. If the following work shall, in its present essay or future progress, assist any to form right conceptions and exhilarating hopes of this stupendous Being so awful, yet so good - so invisible, and yet so manifest; and of His moral arrangements and conduct of human affairs, and of His ulterior destination of His improveable creatures - the main object of its author will be fully and pleasingly accomplished."

Such are the views and the means of the excellent author of this beneficent work, admirably fitted, with its promised sequel, " to con-

The mass of intelligence accumulated during many years, and the extent of reasoning which are both exhibited in this volume, render any thing like a sufficient review of it within our limits, impossible. We can only say, that it is full of matter which the wise must esteem, which the good must approve, and which must benefit the minds of old and young. The design is most laudable, and the execution such as was to be anticipated from the industry and ability of Mr. Turner.

The outline is as follows: - Mr. T. commences with the creation of the earth, and its various important phenomena. He then proceeds with the formation of the planetary system; and returning to our own planet, enters upon the interesting subject of vegetation, the uses of plants, their diffusion, their living principle, and their primeval remains. His next inquiry is to the creation of fishes, their habits, and qualities. Birds, and quadrupeds, and serpents, and insects, being then examined and displayed, we are led upwards to the consideration of man, whose history is traced from the beginning to the Deluge. The whole is applied to virtuous precepts, and to an impressment of the love of the Creator in the souls of the created.

"Fact and sound reasoning (it is remarked as a first principle) should always agree and illustrate each other. If our facts and our reasonings do not concur, one of these must be erroneous. And as in all revealed truths, what is revealed must be true, if that is found to be at variance with our intellectual deductions, the mistake must be in our reasoning or in our inferences. While this discrepancy lasts, we may be sure that we have not hit upon the right solution. However ingenious or plausible our argumentations may be, we have missed the just theory; we have not found the real key; we have not penetrated to the law and principle from which the revealed facts have proceeded, and from which alone the full comprehension of them can be derived."

We may add, as an example of the way in which this argument is developed, the subjoined quotation.

" If the material world had been one uniform homogeneous mass, its eternal existence would have been always a possibility. would then not have contained any evidence in itself to contradict the supposition. But the actual fact is, that all visible nature is a multifarious association of very compounded substances. Nothing is simple - nothing is uncompounded. Every thing we see, feel, or handle, is a composition, a mixture or union of more particles or of more elements than one. Not merely the grosser earthly bodies are ao.

and by their influences are principally formed; but all these are obeying a constant though invisible sovereignty, should still accompany his remaining life, the author deaires to pursue this important subject, in that series of events and operations, which, after the renewal of mankind, became more immediately connected with their economy, condition, polities, and destinies, under the present laws and state of their existence. It is among these we must act, clude the literary labours of a well-spent life. | but even the water, the air, and the light, are in this compounded state. Now, it is impossible that any compound can have been eternally a compound. Composition and eternity are as incompatible, as to be and not to be. The particles of which compounds consist, must have been in some other state before they were compounded together. The single condition of the elements must have preceded their union in the composition; and thus it is physically impossible that a compound can have been eternal. The school-boy perceives at once that his plum-cake cannot have been eternal. The plums, the flour, the butter, the eggs, and the sugar, of which it is composed, must have been in some other places and state, before they were brought together to make the substance which gratifies him. So the mighty World we live on, the rocks, the mountains, the minerals - so every substance around us, animate and inanimate, __cannot have been eter-nal, because every one is a combination of numerous particles, usually very heterogeneous, and the primary elements of each must have been in their elementary state, and in some other position, before they moved and joined into their compound one.

"The annual circuit, or a year, which is the completed orbit of the earth round this luminary, could not take place without a sun; but a day requires the existence and revolving motion of the earth alone. This is mentioned by Moses as beginning before the sun was made the centre of our astronomical system. As this fact denotes the diurnal movement to be distinct from the sun, and independent of it, it is another instance of the correctness of the Mosaic account. The first rotation of the earth round its own axis made the interval of the first day, and each subsequent revolution constituted the several days which succeeded. Our planet might cease to turn round in this diurnal continuity, and might yet circle round the sun in its yearly course. The moon moves in this way about our earth; for it has no rotatory motion. The cause of our earth's revolving round its axis, is quite distinct from the double and mutually counteracting forces which produce its annual orbit. Physics have not discovered, nor can rational conjecture assign, any reason for the diurnal rotation, except the commanding will and exerted power of the divine Creator.

On comets, the author observes -

"If we knew their uses in our system, we could form more probable conjectures as to the chronology of their creation. They have been noticed from the earliest era of astronomical history; and if our modern philosophers had not discovered that some, at least, leave us to return again into our system, and therefore describe a vast elliptical orbit round our sun, we might have fancied that the periods of their first recorded appearances in our field of science were the eras of their individual formation.

Apropos: we are informed that Sir James South has seen the comet from his observatory at Kensington.— Ed. L. G.

But their recurring presence proves that their first existence ascends into unexplored and unrecorded antiquity. Yet from whence they come to us, we as little know, as for what purpose. Tycho Brahe proved that they were farther from the earth than the moon, and were nearly as distant as the planets. The comet of 1682 reappeared in 1759, having in the interval described an orbit like an ellipsis, answering to a revolution of 27,937 days. It will therefore reappear in November 1835, or four years hence. In its greatest distance, it is supposed not to go above twice as far as Uranus. This is indeed a prodigious sweep of space; and it has been justly observed, that the vast distance to which some comets roam, proves how very far the attraction of the sun extends; for though they stretch themselves to such depths in the abyss of space, yet, by virtue of the solar power, they return into its effulgence. But it has been recently discovered that three comets, at least, never leave the planetary system. One, whose period is three years and a quarter, is included within the orb of Jupiter; another, of six years and three quarters, extends not so far as Saturn; and a third, of twenty years, is found not to pass beyond the circuit of Uranus."

One specimen from the branch of natural history must suffice:

"The general character of fish is not that of voracity and hostility. It is gentleness, harmlessness, sociality, and animation. They are peaceful animals; happy in themselves, and for the most part harmonising together, without any general display of savage cruelty or malignant passions. Such as are appointed to be the food of others, die in that way, and are sought and taken for that purpose, when the appetite actuates, but no farther. But they cannot be justly stigmatised as voracious for this habit, more than ourselves for taking and eating them and cattle, sheep, fowls, game, venison, and other living creatures. We are carnivorous, but not voracious. We kill and cook the animals we feed on; but we have no malice, or ill-will, or hostility in such action or diet, any more than in plucking the apple, grinding the corn, or boiling the potato. It is, therefore, unjust to impute peculiar voracity and destructiveness to these tribes, because some feed on smaller fish, and others on the molluscæ, worms, and insects that they find. These latter animals appear to be as specially provided for such as use them, as slugs and caterpillars are for birds, and grass for cattle; for, at particular seasons, the ocean is made to swarm with them, for no other visible purpose than that the fish may derive nutrition from them. The mollusce which supply so many of the natives of the sea with their subsistence, are therefore endowed with a power of multiplication which, as in several other cases, astonishes us by its amount. It is the abundance of these petty invertebrated animals, of various species, so sedulously provided for the nutriment of the fish, which constitutes that luminous appearance, or phosphorescence of the sea, which so often surprises and delights the mariner on his watch in his nightly navigation. If some species of fish are always eating, which is not by any means an authenticated fact, they would but resemble the graminivorous quadrupeds, who pass their day in browsing and in resting rumination; neither can be fitly branded as voracious in such perpetual mastication; for what animal is milder or more inoffensive than the tranquil, though ever-eating cow, who takes 100 lbs. of grass in a day? But there are some facts which indi-cate that the fish have been much misconceived of form and colour. The boiga has a still more cate that the fish have been much misconceived of form and colour. The boiga has a still more much beautiful fugitive poetry in Annuals, &c., in this respect; and that however it may be magnificent appearance, with the same acquired and an established favourite among his countries.

with some particular classes, or at particular seasons, the far greater number take less food, and live with pleasure, and apparently from choice, longer without any ascertainable quantity of it, than any other tribes of animals that we know of. 'The gold and silver fish in our vases seem never to want any food; they are often seen for months without any apparent nourishment.' Even the pike, which has been so much branded as a devouring glutton, fattens on total abstinence. The salmon, although it comes in such multitudes from the ocean into the rivers. yet, when opened, is never found to have any nutritive substance in its stomach; an evidence of their taking none in that period of their existence; for the herrings, when they shoal, are found, on being opened, to have fed largely on the sea-caterpillar in their voyage. lamprey tribe are confessedly small, or no eaters. Many facts of this sort will be recollected by the intelligent naturalist, which will lead him to inquire, whether the great majority of the finny world do not, for the larger part of their existence, content themselves with the nutrition they extract from water alone, without any additional substance.

"The mild and harmless character of the fish class of being, in its general prevalence, is impressively exhibited by most of its largest tribes. The great Greenland whale 'pursues no other animal; leads an inoffensive life; and is harmless in proportion to its strength to do mischief.' The massy sturgeon is of the same gentle nature. The formidable narwhal, or sea unicorn, with all its size and powerful weapon of offence, displays the same disposition. The Oronooko manati, which has been found so huge in bulk, that twenty-seven men could not draw it out of the water, and the others of this tribe, of which some are twenty-eight feet long, and weigh eight thousand pounds, are likewise gentle and peaceable animals. These mightier chiefs of the finny nation are the true representatives of its general character. All are for the most part the same mild, playful, animated and unoffending beings; and have been so designed and organised, habited and stationed. as to be continually of this placed temperament."

Inclined to be pleased with all nature, Mr. Turner says:

"It has been ascertained that the oviparons serpents contain those species which are harmless and inoffensive. Even the oviparous vipers have no fangs, and possess no venom. 'They only offer to our consideration agile movements, elegant and light proportions, and soft or bril-liant colours. The more we are familiarised to them, the more we shall be pleased to meet with them in our woods, our fields, and our gardens. They cannot disturb the pleasures of our rural habitations; but they may increase our enjoyments, by the beauty of their tints. and the vivacity of their motions. They are an addition to the ornaments of the fields; and help, with the other animated beings, to embellish the vast and magnificent theatre of vernal nature.' The green and yellow viper may be seized without risk; and, after being taken, it becomes docile, and can in a great degree be domesticated and made amusive. Though in its natural state, it will, if interrupted, erect itself and hiss, either with anger or fear, yet it does no harm. It has been known to exhibit attachment and affectionate feelings to its human friends. The Roman or Esculapian viper is as mild and tractable. The lady viper unites the escing gentleness, and with an attempt at musical intonation of the serpentine hiss.

Having so far illustrated our amiable author we must notice that several inaccuracies an inconclusive arguments have struck us even i our hurried glance. The following is evidently a misprint.

" Our earth is above ninety millions of mile from the sun : Saturn is above eight hundre more miles farther off; and the next and mo remote that we know, which is connected wit us, the Uranus, is twice that mighty di tance '

Again, the author says:

"The permanent existence of things as the are, is as great a miracle as their original form ation. It is their artificial, and not their na tural state; and a continued Divine agency: as strictly necessary to keep them in it, as was to compel them at first to assume it. Th Divine agency is, therefore, as much a prir ciple or law of subsisting nature, as any of it secondary or material ones."

To us it appears that the original will an fiat are sufficient. But why should we enlarg on trifles like these, or on any small objection to a production altogether so valuable as thi series of letters on the most important of a human subjects? To all we most cordially re commend it.

Poems. By W. C. Bryant, an American Poet Edited by Washington Irving. 8vo. pp. 236 London, 1832. Andrews.

WE cannot better characterise poetry than in Shelley's fine lines, and say that it

"Flows through the mind, and rolls its rapid waves Now dark, now glittering, now reflecting gloom, Now lending splendour—where, from secret springs, The source of human thought its tribute brings."

This glorious fountain has sprung up in al parts of the world-in Greece, amid olive and myrtle groves, mirroring the shine of the spear and shield in the distance, or the braided hair and chiselled features of nearer loveliness, bear ing on its stream the ringing of the trumpe and the murmur of the lyre. It has flowed or even unto our present time, with the names o Shakespeare, Milton, Byron, as landmarks: and what is there to prevent the current of inspiration from crossing the Atlantic, realising the classic fable—an Alpheus wandering to an other shore, and there finding an Arethusa of love and song? Beautiful with its mighty rivers and its immeasurable forests sad with the memory of a noble and perished race-but buoyant with the hopes of present freedom and conscious power-with an enlightened and ardent spirit-America's national poetry should be among the noblest in the world. As vet. no great poet has arisen to give light and existence to the

" Legion of wild thoughts, whose wandering wings Now float above her darkness."

But surely there are the signs of a springtide at hand-the rich soil is saturate with moisture, and the silver waters wait but an impulse to gush forth. A world of fresh and eager thought, of deep and impassioned feeling, is to be found in the occasional poetry of the American newspapers; and there is that poetical feeling abroad, which, though born of, nevertheless precedes, poetry, and to which may be so well applied the description of Aurora in Racine-

" Fille de jour, qui nais devant ton père."

The present volume is by a Transatlantic writer, here favourably known as the author of

We are most happy to bid him weltrymen. come in England. There is much taste, much feeling, much grace in this work; perhaps its chief fault is, that it is not sufficiently American: we do not want translations from the Spanish, nor odes about the liberty of the Greeks; but we want words that bear the impress of their own sky and their own soil. The great charm of Mr. Bryant's writings is their strain of gentle thoughtfulness; and his descriptions are of great beauty. But we will select a few favourites, and leave our readers to judge of how well our praise is deserved.

"To the Past.
Thou unrelenting Past!
Strong are the barriers round thy dark domain,
And fetters, sure and fast,
Hold all that enter thy unbreathing reign. Far in thy realm withdrawn
Old empires at in sullenness and gloom,
And glorious ages gone
Lie deep within the shadow of thy womb.

Childhood, with all its mirth, Youth, manhood, age that draws us to the ground, And last, man's life on earth, Glide to thy dim dominions, and are bound.

Thou hast my better years,
Thou hast my earlier friends—the good, the kind,
Yielded to thee with tears—
The venerable form—the exalted mind.

My spirit yearns to bring
The lost ones back—yearns with desire intense,
And struggles hard to wring
Thy bolts apart, and pluck thy captives thence.

In vain: thy gates deny
All passage, save to those who hence depart;
Nor to the streaming eye
Thou givest them back, nor to the broken heart.

In thy abyses hide
Beauty and excellence unknown—to thee
Earth's wonder and her pride
Are gathered, as the waters to the sea.

Labours of good to man, Unpublished charity, unbroken faith, Love that 'midst grief began, And grew with years, and faltered not in death—

Full many a mighty name
Lurks in thy depths, unuttered, unrevered;
With thee are silent fame,
Forgotten arts, and wisdom disappeared—

Thine for a space are they,
Yet shalt thou yield thy treasures up at last;
Thy gates shall yet give way.
Thy bolts shall fall, inexorable Past!

All that of good and fair
Has gone into thy womb from earliest time,
Shall then come forth, to wear
The glory and the beauty of its prime.

They have not perished—no!
Kind words—remembered voices, once so sweet.
Smiles, radiant long ago—
And features, the great soul's apparent seat—

All shall come back—each tie
Of pure affection shall be knit again;
Aloae shall Evil die,
And Sozrow dwell a prisoner in thy reign.

And then shall I behold Him by whose kind paternal side I sprung, And her who, still and cold, Fills the next grave—the beautiful and young."

How noble is the following passage from the " Forest Hymn!"

Forest Hymn?

"Here is continual worship. Nature here,
In the tranquillity that thou dost love,
Enjoys thy presence. Noiselessly around,
From perch to perch, the solitary bird
Passes; and yon clear spring, that 'midst its herbs
Wells softly forth, and visits the strong roots
Of half the mighty forrest, tells no tale
Of all the good it does. Thou hast not left
Thyself without a witness, in these shades,
Of thy perfections. Grandeur, strength, and grace,
Are here to speak of thee. This mighty oak,
By whose immovable stem I stand, and seem Almost annihilated—not a prince,
In all that proud old world beyond the deep,
E'er wore his crown as loftly as he Wears the green coronal of leaves with which Thy hand has graced him. Nestled at his root
Is beauty, such as blooms not in the glare
Of the broad sun. That delicate forest-flower,
With scented breath, and look so like a smile,
Seems, as it issues from the shapeless mould,
An emanation of the indwelling life,
A visible token of the upholding love,
That are the soul of this wide universe."
Next, for the rugged desolation of "Monu

Next, for the rugged desolation of " Monument Mountain:"-

"There, as thou standst, The haunts of men below thee, and around The mountain summits, thy expanding heart Shall feel a kindred with that loftler world Shall feel a kindred with that loftler world
To which thou art translated, and partake
The enlargement of thy vision. Thou shall look Upon the green and rolling forest-tops,
And down into the secrets of the glens
And streams, that with their bord'ring thickets strive
To hide their windings. Thou shall gaze, at once,
Here on white villages and tilth and herds
And swarming roads, and there on sollitudes
That only hear the torrent and the wind
And eagle's shriek. There is a precipice
That seems a fragment of some mighty wall,
Built by the hand that fashioned the old world
To separate its nations, and thrown down That seems a fragment of some mighty wall, Built by the hand that fashioned the old world To separate its nations, and thrown down When the flood drowned them. To the north, a path Conducts you up the narrow battlement.

Steep is the western side, shaggy and wild With mossy trees, and plunacies of flint, And many a hanging crag. But, to the east, Sheer to the vale go down the bare old cliffs—Huge pillars that in middle heaven upbear Their weather-beaten capitals—here dark With the thick moss of centuries, and there Of chalky whiteness where the thunderbolt Has splintered them. It is a fearful thing To stand upon the beetling verge, and see Where storm and lightning from that huge gray wall Have tumbled down vast blocks, and at the base Dashed them in fragments; and to lay thine ear Over the dixzy depth, and hear the sound of winds that struggle with the woods below, Come up like ocean murmurs. But the scene Is lovely round: a beautiful river there Wanders amid the fresh and fertile meads, The paradise he made unto himself, wanders amid the fresh and fertile means,
The paradise he made unto himself,
Mining the soil for ages. On each side
The fields swell upward to the hills—beyond,
Above the hills, in the blue distance, rise
The mighty columns with which earth props heaven."

There is yet new imagery for a love-song-witness the "Hunter's Serenade:"—

"Thy bower is finished, fairest!
Fit bower for hunter's bride—
Where old woods overshadow
The green savannah's side.
I've wandered long and wandered far,
And never have I met,
In all this lovely western land,
A spot so lovely yet.
But I shall think it fairer
When they are cone to blees. When thou art come to bless,
With thy sweet eyes and silver voice,
Its silent loveliness.

Its silent loveliness.

For thee the wild grape glistens
On sunny knoll and tree,
And stoops the allm papayas
With yellow fruit for thee:
For thee the duck on glassy stream,
The prairie-fowl, shall die,
My rifle for thy feast shall bring
The wild awan from the sky;
The forest's leaping panther,
Fierce, beautiful, and fleet,
Shall yield his spotted hide to be
A carpet for thy feet.

A carpet for thy reet.

I know, for thou hast told me,
Thy maiden love of flowers;
Ah! those that deck thy gardens
Are pale compared with ours.
When our wide woods and mighty lawns
Bloom to the April skies,
The earth has no more gorgeous sight
To shew to human eyes.
In meadows red with blossoms,
All summer long, the bee
Murmurs, and loads his yellow thighs,
For thee, my love and me.

Or, wouldst thou gaze at tokens
Of ages long ago?
Our old oaks stream with mosses,
And sprout with mistletoe;
And mighty vines, like serpents, climb
The glant sycamore:
And trunks, o'erthrown for centuries, Cumber the forest floor; Cumber the forest noor;
And in the great savannah
The solitary mound,
Built by the elder world, o'erlooks
The loneliness around.

Come, thou hast not forgotten
Thy pledge and promise quite,
With many blushes murmured,
Beneath the evening light.
Come, the young violets crowd my door,
Thy earliest look to win,
And at my silent window-sill
The jessamine peeps in;
All day the redbreast warbles
Upon the mulberry near. Upon the mulberry near, nd the night-sparrow trills her song All night, with none to hear."

We conclude with two other poems:-

" Autumn Woods

Ere, in the northern gale,
The summer tresses of the trees are gone,
The woods of autumn, all around our vale,
Have put their glory on.

The mountains that infold

In their wide sweep the coloured landscape round, Seem groups of giant kings, in purple and gold, That guard the enchanted ground.

I roam the woods that crown
The upland, where the mingled splendours glow,
Where the gay company of trees look down
On the green fields below.

My steps are not alone
In these bright walks: the sweet south-west, at play,
Flies, rustling, where the painted leaves are strown
Along the winding way.

And far in heaven, the while, The sun, that sends that gale to wander here, Pours out on the fair earth his quiet smile— The sweetest of the year.

Where now the solemn shade, Verdure and gloom where many branches meet— So grateful, when the noon of summer made The valleys sick with heat?

Let in through all the trees Come the strange rays; the forest depths are bright; Their sunny-coloured foliage in the breeze Twinkles, like beams of light.

The rivulet, late unseen,
Where bickering through the shrubs its waters run,
Shines with the image of its golden screen,
And glimmerings of the sun.

But 'neath you crimson tree, Lover to listening maid might breathe his flame, Nor mark, within its roscate canopy, Her blush of maiden shame.

Oh, autumn! why so soon
Depart the hues that make thy forests glad—
Thy gentle wind and thy fair sunny noon,
And leave thee wild and sad?

Ah! 'twere a lot too blest
For ever in thy coloured shades to stray;
Amidst the kisses of the soft south-west
To rove and dream for aye;

And leave the vain low strife
That makes men mad—the tug for wealth and power,
The passions and the cares that wither life,
And waste its little hour."

" Song of Marion's Men. Our band is few, but true and tried— Our leader frank and bold; The forman trembles in his camp When Marion's name is told. When Marion's name is told.
Our fortress is the good green wood,
Our tent the cypress tree;
We know the forest round us,
As seamen know the sea;
We know its walls of thorny vines,
Its glades of reedy grass,
Its safe and silent islands
Within the dark worms. Within the dark moras Wo to the heedless soldiery Who little think us near!

Who little think us near!
On them shall light at midnight
A strange and sudden fear,
When, waking to their tents on fire,
They grasp their arms in vain,
And they who stand to face us
Are beat to earth again;
And they who fly in terror, deem
A mighty host behind,
And hear the tramp of thousands
Upon the hollow wind.

Then sweet the hour that brings release Then sweet the hour that brings release
From danger and from toll:
We talk the battle over,
And share the battle's spoil.
The woodland rings with laugh and shout,
As if a hunt were up,
And woodland flowers are gathered
To crown the soldier's cup.
With merry songs we mock the wind
That in the pine-top grieves,
And slumber long and sweetly
On beds of caken leaves.
Well knows the fair and friendly moce.

Well knows the fair and friendly moon The band that Marion leads, The band that Marion leads,
The glitter of their rifles,
The scampering of their steeds.
The ilife our fiery barbs to guide
Across the moonlight plains;
Tis life to feel the night-wind
That lifts their tossing manes.
A moment in the ravaged camp—
A moment—and away
Back to the pathless forest,
Before the peep of day.
Grave men there are by broad Sar

Grave men there are by broad Santee, Grave men with hoary hairs, Their hearts are all with Marion, For Marion are their prayers;

And loveliest ladies greet our band With kindliest welcoming— With smiles like those of summer, And tears like those of spring. And tears take those or spring.

For them we wear these trusty arms,
And lay them down no more

Till we have driven the oppressor, For ever, from our shore

The translations are good, and yet we would gladly have dispensed with them. Never did the early literature of any country become great by imitation. Why have the American prose writers done more in literature than their poets? Because they have flung themselves on their resources, and given their works a naof Antæus, is in his mother-earth.

The Family Library, No. XXVII. British Painters, Sculptors, and Architects. Vol. V. 12mo. pp. 311. Murray.

sone himself he says:

"To depart at once from the formal corpsequired boldness as well as genius; and there can be no question that Jamesone did all this. It may gratify certain sorts of critics to dwell on the undoubted facts, that a certain hardness works; that his portraits are often of a severe aspect, with a touch too much of the vinegar of the times in them; and that he has reached but seldom the perfect ease and happy gracefulcolouring lucid, and his proportions just; and he was the first native of our island who refused to limit himself to miniatures, like Hilliard and Oliver, and transferred life of the natural dimensions to his canvass. That he stands at the head of the British school of portrait-painting there can, therefore, be no question; nor had England an artist of her own worthy of being named above him in his own walk, before the days of Reynolds. When we consider the circumstances of the painter and his times, his want of instructors and models. and the various difficulties which the fanatical prejudices of that dark age must have presented to any cultivator of the graceful arts, it is impossible not to admit that Scotland has all reason to be proud of George Jamesone."

In his memoir of Romney, Mr. Cunningham has dwelt with much severity on the separation, for a long course of years, of that distinguished artist from his wife. Far be it from us to defend conjugal desertion; but there may be circumstances attending it of which a stranger can know nothing, and which greatly palliate what they do not entirely justify. We have reason to believe that such circumstances existed in the case in question.

The life of Mr. Copley is rendered interest ing, not so much by his own rank as a painter, although he was a man of considerable ability, as by the elevation to which his highly-gifted son, Lord Lyndhurst, has attained in the Copley and Mary Singleton his wife; and was, hy the most credible accounts, born at Boston in America, on the third day of July, 1737. His father was of English descent, had resided long in Ireland, and, after marrying a lady of that country, removed to the New World, so nigh the time that his son was born, as to countenance a report which prevailed, when he became eminent, that he was a native of Ireland. The fact that he was all along claimed as an American by the general rumour of the United States, might, perhaps, have tional character. The Transatlantic writer been alleged to prove little; since, in a country may rely upon it, that his strength, like that constantly receiving and willingly adopting new citizens from all quarters, considerable looseness as to such a point might be considered as natural. John Scolloy, of Boston, however, appears to furnish distinct evidence: when writing to the painter in 1782, he says; 'I ANOTHER valuable addition to the history of trust, amidst this blaze of prosperity, that you the arts and of their professors. Jamesone, don't forget your dear native country, and the Ramsay, Romney, Runciman, Copley, Morcause it is engaged in, which I know lay once timer, Raeburn, Hoppner, Owen, Harlow, near your heart, and, I trust, does so still, and Bonington, are the subjects of the present volume. To the life of the first of ceed. In whatever country he was born, he these, Mr. Cunningham has prefixed a history was educated in America; and to her he owes of Scottish art, from the time of John de Lin- his first inspiration in art. This came upon lithgow, the early part of the fourteenth, down him, it seems, early enough. When some to that of Jamesone, the early part of the seven or eight years old, he was observed to seventeenth century, which contains much absent himself from the family circle for several curious and valuable information. Of Jame-hours at a time, and was traced to a lonely hours at a time, and was traced to a lonely room, on whose bare walls he had drawn, in charcoal, a group of martial figures, engaged like system of making figures, and assert the in some nameless adventure. Boston, at this grace of form and the colouring of nature, re- period, had neither academy of arts nor private instructors. Copley had therefore to educate himself — a task, after all, not so difficult to genius as the dull imagine, — and which he set about undismayed, in the absence of models of manner is visible even in the happiest of his and masters. It is noteworthy, that, almost at the same hour, America produced, amid her deserts and her trading villages, two distinguished painters, West and Copley, who, un-known to each other, were schooling themness of nature. His outlines are correct, his selves in the rudiments of art, attempting portraits of their friends one day, and historical composition the other; studying nature from the naked Apollos of the wilderness, as some one called the native warriors; and making experiments on all manner of colours, primitive and compound; in short, groping, through inspiration, the right way to eminence and fame. Of Copley's very early works, no better account can be rendered than that they were chiefly portraits and domestic groups, to which the wild wood scenery of America usually formed back grounds."

Although he exhibited for many previous years at Somerset House, it was not until 1774 that Mr. Copley left America for Europe, and not until 1775 that he established himself in London. "The Death of Chatham," and "The Death of Major Peirson," are the historical works on which his reputation principally rests. Mr. Copley was also much employed thus relates an amusing incident in his prac-

"A certain man came to Copley, and had himself, his wife, and seven children, all included in a family piece: 'It wants but one thing,' said he, 'and that is the portrait of my first wife; for this one is my second.' But,' said the artist, ' she is dead, you know, sir; what can I do? she is only to be admitted as an angel.' 'Oh, no! not at all,' answered the other; 'she must come in as a woman — was the son," says Mr. Cunningham, "of John | back : when he returned he had a stranger lady on his arm. 'I must have another cast of your hand, Copley,' he said; 'an accident befell my second wife: this lady is my third, and she is come to have her likeness included in the family picture.' The painter complied; the likeness was introduced; and the husband looked with a glance of satisfaction on his three spouses. Not so the lady; she remonstrated; never was such a thing heard of -out her predecessors must go. The artist painted them out accordingly; and had to bring an action at law to obtain payment for the portraits which he had obliterated."

Of Sir Henry Raeburn it is told, that when only six years old he lost both his parents, and was placed by some friends " in 'Heriot's Wark,' the Christ's school of Edinburgh, where he was trained, with all solicitude, both in morality and learning. To classical proficiency, indeed, he at no time ever laid claim, yet his education had been such as enabled him to maintain, without reproach, an intercourse by letters with some of the first literary men of the age; and his manners had been so well cared for, that he was never found wanting in that gentlemanly decorum and politeness which is not only becoming but necessary in a portrait-painter. Those who remembered him at school said that he mastered his tasks like other boys, and seemed neither very bright nor very dull. In one thing, however, they remarked his superiority during moments of idleness, such as are common in all classes : when the scholars drew figures on their slates or copy-books, those of Raeburn surpassed them all. The same thing was perceived in the school sketches of Wilkie; in the figures of arithmetic he was like other boys, but in the figures of men he had no rival. Raeburn has been often heard to say, that at school he formed intimacies with boys which became the best friendships of his manhood. His nature was open and sincere; and though his temper was quick and warm, it had that quality in it which never estranged friends, nor permanently offended any one. At the age of fifteen he was removed from school; but so little did his genius decide for him, that when a profession to be his support through life was to be chosen, he preferred that of a goldsmith, and was apprenticed accordingly. The silver chasing and engraving of Hogarth, and the wood-carving and gilding of Chantrey, were something akin to their feelings, and even to their after pursuits: the trade selected by Raeburn was less so, though it is connected with much that is elegant in workmanship and design. In the goldsmith's shop he remembered his sketches at school; and commencing first with caricatures of his companions, he persevered till a better and worthier art rose out of his attempts."

Among Raeburn's earliest associates, was "the learned and witty John Clerk, afterwards a judge of the Court of Session, under the title as a portrait-painter; and Mr. Cunningham of Lord Eldin; a gentleman of rare parts, who, to his other acquirements, added some skill of hand in the art of painting. The young artist and the young advocate," continues Mr. Cunningham, "were frequently together; and, as the one had to purchase costly colours and the other expensive books, it is said they were sometimes so poor, that they scarcely knew how to live till more money came in. On one of these occasions Raeburn received an invitation to dine with Clerk; and, hastening to his lodgings, he found learned profession to which he devoted him-no angels for me.' The portrait was added; the landlady spreading a cloth on the table, self, and in the political world. "He (Copley) but some time elapsed before the person came and setting down two dishes, one containing three herrings and the other three potatoes. 'And is this all?' said John. 'All.' said the landlady. 'All! did I not tell ye, woman,' he exclaimed, 'that a gentleman was to dine with me, and that ye were to get six herrings and six potatoes?' The tables of both were better furnished before the lapse of many years; and they loved, it is said, when the wine was flowing, to recall those early days, when hope was high, and the spirit unrebuked by intercourse with the world.

When in the height of his practice. Sir Henry's daily routine was as follows:

"He rose at seven during summer, took breakfast about eight with his wife and children, walked into George Street, and was ready for a sitter by nine; and of sitters he generally had, for many years, not fewer than three or four a day. To these he gave an hour and a half each. He seldom kent a sitter more than two hours, unless the person happenedand that was often the case—to be gifted with more than common talents. He then felt himself happy; and never failed to detain the party, till the arrival of a new sitter intimated that he must be gone. For a head size he generally required four or five sittings: and he preferred painting the head and hands to any other part of the body; assigning as a reason that they required least consideration. A fold of drapery, or the natural ease which the casting of a mantle over the shoulder demanded. occasioned him more perplexing study than a head full of thought and imagination. Such was the intuition with which he penetrated at once to the mind, that the first sitting rarely came to a close without his having seized strongly on the character and disposition of the individual. He never drew-in his heads, or indeed any part of the body, with chalk,—a system pursued successfully by Lawrence,-but began with the brush at once. The forehead, chin, nose, and mouth, were his first touches He always painted standing, and never used a stick for resting his hand on; for such was his accuracy of eye, and steadiness of nerve, that he could introduce the most delicate touches. or the utmost mechanical regularity of line without aid or other contrivance than fair offhand dexterity. He remained in his paintingroom till a little after five o'clock, when he walked home, and dined at six.

"His merits as a portrait-painter," says Mr. Cunningham, "were very great. He aimed at elevation and dignity of style; he desired to bring out the mental qualities of his sitters, and considered the nice detail of the features as unworthy of a work of art. The distant view which he took presented nature to him in its grandest expression; and he caught the ruling passion of the face by taking the broad result, and not the detail. This was no doubt a dangerous experiment, and succeeded best with heads of natural dignity. By neglecting the lesser features, all subordinate expression was sunk: it was the application of the historical style to humble purposes; and Raeburn may be accused of conferring intellectual dignity upon heads unworthy of such honour. One of his greatest triumphs is in his last portrait of Sir Walter Scott. The face of this illustrious man is far from expressing his powers when you are at his elbow; but the distance at which Raeburn sought the character lent enchantment at once, and in the light and shade of his masses the author of Marmion and Old Mortality appeared. In expressing female loveliness he seldom ex-

of Lawrence:

"Those who merely consider Hoppner as a limner of men and women's heads, who dashed them off at a few sittings, pocketed the price, replenished his palette, and prepared himself for any new comer, do his memory injustice. He was a fine free-spirited manly fellow, over-flowing with wit and humour, inconsiderate in speech, open-hearted, and as well acquainted with the poetry and history of his native country as the most gifted of her sons. The fame of his conversational powers survives among his companions. He was considered one of the best-informed painters of his time; and in the company of the learned, not less than among the gay and the noble of that day, he was easy and unembarrassed. Amongst his brethren of the easel he was still more at home. and made himself welcome by his ready wit and various knowledge. It was sometimes his pleasure, in the midst of a serious discussion, to start aside into the whimsical or the humorous: and, in the midst of boisterous mirth, he would as suddenly return to seriousness. Few could be quite sure when they had his sympathy: wanted - for then it failed not.'

But our space is rapidly contracting; and, passing over many passages of this entertaining volume, to which we would otherwise draw the attention of our readers, we will conclude by quoting the following from Mr. Cunningham's notice of that " fine genius united with a frail body," poor Bonington:

"Bonington was more than a mere landscape-painter. He included within his scene whatever naturally and properly belonged to it: on the sea-side he had fishermen; on the sea itself ships under sail, with all their mariners - pinnaces and barges, with freights of beauty: ashore, he gave to the garden, ladies playing on the lute, or listening to the song of the bird or of the lover; he peopled his walks and groves with life, and shewed no common skill and taste in his groups and figures. In this he resembled Gainsborough, whose peasants are not the least pleasing part of his landscapes. Nor did Bonington desire to depict merely an acre or two of nature, and trust to the literal reality of his scene for success: he knew that nature presents much to the eye on which art has no colours to squander; he therefore singled out scenes which, either from extreme loveliness, from picturesque effect, or old association, he knew would please; and these he handled with singular ease and delicacy. It cannot be denied, however, that most of his Italian pictures are tinctured with his feeling for some of the great masters of the pencil. Instead of being contented with looking at what lay before himself, his desire was to borrow the eyes of Canaletti, or some other favourite of days gone by. All this gratified the connoisseur, but not those who judged from nature : to look like Canaletti with the former was a grace, with the latter a deformity. There is a painful precision about Canaletti - a disagreeable slavishness of fidelity, resembling that of the painter who drenched his field of battle in blood, for the purpose of proving how heroic the contest had been. Bonington had not the half of this minute precision, and yet he had too much; but his brilliant and poetical colouring threw a lustre over these mechanical overaccuracies. He tried all the styles of painting below the historical, and attained eminence in them all: moreover, he tried all the methods of the various schools; and it was one of his placed, wherever there occurs identity of form character of Hoppner, for many years the rival | Dutch, the vigour of the Venetians, the science of the Romans, and the sense of the English. all in one grand performance. This wild scheme, which even the poetic and fervent Fuseli had considered impracticable, was looked upon by Bonington as a matter of no great difficulty; his French biographer regrets that he did not live to put such a plan into execution; and mentions, that he had selected a series of subjects from the history of the middle ages, on which to make the experiment.

"Bonington was tall, well, and even to appearance, strongly formed. 'His countenance,' says the French biographer, 'was truly English: and we loved him for his melancholy air, which became him more than smiles.' memory of his person will soon wear away; but it will fare otherwise with his fame. He lived long enough to assert his title to a high place amongst English landscape-painters, and ad produced works which bid fair to be ranked permanently with the foremost. They are not numerous, but for that very reason they will. perhaps, be the more prized. A series of engravings, amounting to some four and twenty, has been published by Carpenter, from pictures except, indeed, in the hour when it was really of this artist, some in his own possession, some in the galleries of the Marquess of Lansdown, the Duke of Bedford, and other patrons of art. The best of these are the landscapes; and of the landscapes, the worthiest are of mingled sea and land,—pieces distinguished by great pic-turesque beauty, and singular grace of execution. His practice was, to sketch in the outline and general character, and then make accurate studies of the local light-and-shade, and colour. His handling was delicate and true, and his colouring clear and harmonious. It cannot, however, be denied, that he wants vigour and breadth; that his more poetic scenes are too light and slim; and his express copies from nature too literal and real. He was a softer sort of Gainsborough, with more than his grace, and with not a little of his taste for scattering happy and characteristic groups among landscape scenes — but, it must be added, with only a far-off approach to the strength of that great master. That, had his life been prolonged, he would have risen to very high distinction, cannot be doubted. It was his generous dream, we are told, to acquire a competency by painting commissions, and then dedicate his time and pencil to historical compositions, - a dream which many artists have dreamed; but his works have little of the epic in them. Nature gave him good advice, when she directed his steps to the surf-beat shore, and bade him paint the swelling tide, the busy boats, fishermen drying their nets, and the sea-eagle looking from the rock upon his wide and, to him, fruitful dominion."

> Théorie des Ressemblances, etc. - Theory of Resemblances; or, a Philosophical Essay on the Means of determining the Physical and Moral Dispositions of Animals from the Analogies of Forms of Covering and of Colours. By the Chevalier de G. M. 4to. Paris, 1831. Treuttel and Würtz.

In remarking upon the second volume of Professor Lyell's Geology, which treats of the suc-cession of organised beings and the identity of species, we were led to make some observations upon the influence of the conditions of existence, or the habits and manners of beings, on their form and structure. Now, if form, fugitive in the animal kingdom, is modified by the circumstances in which the individuals are The following is a summary of the personal 'imaginations' to combine the fidelity of the in the immense series of organised beings, we should expect to meet with conformity of instincts, of habits, and of manners. In the work now before us, got up at private expense, in all the beauty of Parisian type and paper, M. Ma-chado (such is the author's name) has endeavoured, not so much to point out the laws of these resemblances, as to illustrate their existence in a series of lithographic prints, where animals, apparently of the most incongruous characters, are compared with one another, and even with the vegetable world; for, giving all the latitude to analogy that it is capable of when brought to illustrate affinity, the author, with much ingenuity, has also made the covering and the colour of organised beings bear upon the more philosophical evidences which are to be derived from similarity of form. We remember that the author of Paul and Virginia, in his Etudes de la Nature, compares a wasp to a tiger; both are barred with yellow and black stripes, and both have similar instincts and propensities. It was with the Abbé the same doctrine of the fitness of things which was promulgated by Pythagoras, and which, applied to the inorganic world, led that philosopher to consider the blue sea breaking in white spray on the dark rock as a warning to sailors, and a further evidence of the fitness of all things. Thus, we might add, in a range of mountains, the green acclivity mingles with the pasture of the valley, the barren rock diminishes the intensity of shades, and the eternal snows seek companionship with the clouds.

In reproducing the importance of external form, M. M. considers that he is rendering a service to science. We need hardly remark that the very contrary is the case; for, when form is fugitive, and external appearances, according to his own principles, vary with situation and with habit, the principle of connexions and the elective affinity of parts by which similar structures can be traced throughout their various modifications, will alone be the foundation of a stationary science and a philosophic anatomy. Besides, our author has reasoned upon a fundamental error in supposing that the structure entails the habit: and thus he compares the racehorse and the greyhound as exhibiting the physical influence on instinctive disposition, from which springs a fatality which, he says, was admitted by the ancients. Now, the racehorse is a proof of the modification entailed on form and instinct by the influence of circumstances which become hereditary, just as much as a cultivated sensibility characterises the higher classes of a long-civilised society.

In studying the external appearances of animals, M. Machado has chiefly interested himself with the physiognomy and the colour, and thus was led from them to a comparison of the habits of the animals. He thus includes the doctrines of Lavater, Porta, and Gall, the latter of which he details at length; and though his results cannot obtain a place in scientific natural history, they present us with many striking analogies and facts so remotely and yet so wisely connected, that we cannot help contemplating them with all that interest and admiration which is derived from some new insight into the beauty and harmony of omniscient nature.

M. Machado trained a number of birds and animals in his house and even in his study. Among these was a specimen of the Saimiri (Cebus flavus), a very pretty Brazilian monkey, which is represented in the first plate, and compared with the pug dog: they resemble one another in expression of countenance and form

Saimiri is then compared with one of the owl | We now proceed to the pleasant task of qu tribe, and the orange frog of Brazil, which, tion. from its extreme thinness, has been called skeleton frog. This monkey is remarkable for its attachment to its young, and it is compared in the form of its head with that of a woman who was afflicted with a monomania dependent on extreme development of the cerebellum. The cart-horse is compared with the yoked ox; the lion with the Angora cat and lion dog! the hyæna with the shepherd's dog: and many other comparisons are made, which it would not be doing the author justice to quote, without at the same time detailing, with his ingenuity, the distant relation in instinct and manners which exists between animals whose external appearances are the same to a certain extent. Those which have pleased us most are the comparisons instituted between the wren, the woodcock, the mouse, the little butterfly (Erycina thersandes), and a dead leaf; and the similarity between certain butterflies and birds, and between moths and owls, in appearance and in habits. Had M. M. left his own menagerie and gone into the fields, he perhaps might have found as many illustrations of these analogies as in a cabinet which brought together the productions of the four quarters of the globe. It is curious that, in the cultivation of this taste for natural harmony, our author has found scepticism compatible with it, or with that sensibility of heart which has led him so often to enforce humanity towards the brute creation. Was it not rather to suit the spirit of the times in the country where he wrote, than the inward conviction arising from a just conception of the wisdom and order subsisting in the world around him? His scepticism, however, does not interfere with his other objects, being contained in distant allusions, so indistinct as hardly to blemish the truths which every reflective mind will obtain from these entertaining pages. The work is well worthy of perusal, and capable of ingrafting a love for natural history much sooner than the uninteresting descriptions of which that science is too often made to consist.

The Mind; and other Poems. By Charles Swain. Second Edition. 12mo. pp. 264. London, 1832, Simpkin and Co.; Edinburgh, Oliver and Boyd.

THE words "second edition," so rare now-adays on the title-page of a poem, are almost equally pleasant to the author and to the critic to the author, who finds that the hope held out by praise has been fulfilled; and to the critic, who finds that his opinion has been confirmed. Mr. Swain well deserves encouragement and success, for they but stimulate him to farther exertion. The first and longest poem, on "the Mind," has been almost entirely rewritten, and greatly improved; we prefer, however, extracting one of the new poems, for " the Mind" ought to be read as a whole—the vein of thought taken up at the beginning and pursued to the end: it should be read carefully, and will well repay that care. We must enter our protest, though, against one of the subjects; we allude to a verse founded on an extract from Sheridan's celebrated speech on the Begum question. It is never too late to do justice; and we are sorry to see Mr. Swain giving the life of poetry to the false and violent charges brought against Warren Hastings, who certainly was one of those ill-used individuals whose memories remain signal instances of the of head; and it is a curious fact that all the injustice of party spirit: but eloquence, like cynocephalous monkeys bark like dogs. The charity, has often covered a multitude of sins.

Stranger, thrice twenty years have fled
Since first these eyes beheld the light;
Friends, parents, kindred, all are dead!
Day seems but like a second night.
Yet ah! not always hath the morn
Thus cold and ahadowy met my game:
I knew a time when Joys were born,
But that was in my better days.

A cot stands by the village brook, Half-shadowed by an alder-tree, Where roses through the casement look, where roses in rough the casement stock.
And lingers near the summer bee;
And from the vale—how pleasantly!—
The flowers shine like a thousand rays:
Once such a home remain'd for me,
But that was in my better days.

Some spell relumes my aged sight; A mirror of the past I view, An inward vision of delight, As beautiful as true!

A girl steps from that cottage door,
A world of brightness she surveys;
Ah! such a world was mine, before
I lost the charm of better days. I hear sweet bells upon the air-

a near sweet tens upon the air—
I see a glad and youthful band,
A village bride and bridegroom there
Before the holy altar stand!
When, when shall Time's bereaving wave
The memory of that more exact;
Within the shadow of my grave,
I muse upon those batter daws I muse upon those better days.

I muse upon those better days.

It was no passion frall and fleet,
No idle fancy of the heart;
We knew but one delight—to meet!
We felt but one repret—to part!
He was the heaven of my soul,
The light which love alone conveys;
My heart could scarce contain the who
Deep earnest bliss of better days.

He spoke not, though this spirit fell
Beneath the darkness of decline;
He would not, could not bear to tell
Aught that might grieve one thought of r
But ah! a wife's fond glance too soon
Will mark the startling hue which preys
Upon the grace of manhood's noon,
And darkens all life's better days.

I heard his voice, the rich and deep! Die in so sadly sweet a lay, As though the tones were tears to weep As though the tones were tears to weep
The passing soul away!
Then I had given worlds for one—
For one, but one of all Hope's rays!
But Death stood by my side alone,
And buried low my better days.

A widow with two orphans pale,
Sits mourning near a new-raised mound;
The wintry winds around her wail,
She hears, but 'tis a wilder sound!
The hollow murmur of the tomb—
The 'dust to dust' her ear delays; She turns, but, wrecked amidst the gloom, Where may she seek for better days?

Like buds which open to the eve, And flourish 'midst the sunless dew; And flourish must the sumess deve; As willows that most bend and grieve, Rise lovelier and stronger too; So beautiful the orphans grew!
A sweetness youth alone displays; And oh! their father's eyes of bue Recalled the dreams of better days.

It was a sinful act to pine,
When God had left my children still;
But little could I then divine
The coming dawn of deeper ill.
My boy from infancy had loved
The ocean's stern and stormy ways:

late the tear to nage to work Alas! that early passion proved Another bane to better days.

'Twas pain to see his cheek grow pale,
And know the cause was love for me;
And 1—I gave him leave to sail
Across the wide unsparing sea!
And long I paced the lonely shore,
And prayed to Him whose mandate sways
The mighty deep for evermore—
To Him who gave my better days!

Once more I sought my home in tears,
And deem'd the worst of woe begun;
Ah! Stranger, it is sixteen years,
Long years, since I beheld my son!
But now my soul with prayer is meek,
And humbly God's behest obeys;
Yet 'tis my love, my joy to speak
Of other times, of better days!

I had a dream, but dreams are frail, Too frail for hope, however light; 'Twas of a small and homeward sail, That seemed to linger in my sight-

One of those bright and pictured leaves Which slumber to the old displays; A vision which the heart receives As harbinger of better days.

As naturager or better days.

But never more my hope, my pride,
Will here return to bless my gaze!

'He is returned, 'the stranger cried—
'Returned, to bring thee better days!
Thy soul shall lose its sad alarms—
A haven for thine age is won!'
She caught the stranger in her arms—
She clasped her loved, her long-lost son!"

Purity of taste, a love of nature, a keen perception of the beautiful, thoughtfulness, musical words, and feeling - all these characterise Mr. Swain; and what are they but the characteristics of the poet?

Essay on Cholera, &c. By James A. Lawrie, M.D. &c. Second Edition. Glasgow, 1832. London, Longman and Co.

Observations on Cholera, made during a Visit to Sunderland. By George Parsons, Surgeon to the Birmingham Town Infirmary. Birmingham, 1832.

Observations on the Epidemic Cholera of Asia and Europe. By James M'Cabe, M.D. Cheltenham, 1832.

DR. LAWRIE has made observations on the pestilential disease called cholera, in India, in Sunderland, and in Newcastle; and the second edition of his pamphlet contains some account of the appearance of the same malady at Kirkintilloch. Dr. L. had been inclined previously to ascribe the appearance of the malady in Newcastle to communication with Sunderland; but the manner in which it has since started up in Haddington and Kirkintilloch, has led him to doubt the correctness of his first opinion; just as the history of the propagation of the disease teaches the existence of infectious properties of which we afterwards become sceptical, when we find that ourselves, and many others, may go into the neighbourhood of that infection without being the victims of its poisonous influence. We have now exclusive and good authority to state, that a sailor landed on the coast near Haddington, and proceeded to that town, where he became the first victim of the disease; just as, in the poignancy of grief, a man wrapped the shawl of his deceased wife round his neck on going from Musselburgh to Leith, and took the infection to the last-mentioned place. Dr. L. defines a contagious disease to be one capable of producing a similar disease in the majority of those exposed to its influence; as some have objected to its being a contagious disease, because it did not affect all who were exposed to its influence! But according to neither of these definitions, or rather suppositions, would cholera be a contagious disease. The seed of a lichen may fall upon a stone and not produce a plant, but numerous seeds will corrupt and furnish soil. Cholera, at its onset, only attacks the predisposed; but when numerous victims give intensity to the infection, it will prove contagious even to the majority of those who are exposed to its influence. Dr. Lawrie's statement, that the nurse at Sunderland may have caught the disease in her own house, is decidedly incorrect, as she had hardly left the hospital for half an hour for several weeks previous to her decease. Dr. L. divides the disease into common, spasmodic, and malignant; and the latter into the premonitory, the acute, the Hans Sloane; a Tale, illustrating the History collapsed, the rallying, and the febrile stages. Spasms, in our own opinion, characterise the diathesis in this disease, but cannot be considered as affording, by their appearance, the necessity of a distinction in the nature of the maledy itself: in this case, we shall have com- interest.

mon and malignant forms remaining, which will be merely different degrees of intensity of the same malady. A better method would have been advantageous; but the observations included under these different heads, contain much that is valuable, and, at the present moment, highly deserving of perusal. Mr. Parsons exhibits in his collection of cases, how much industry he gave to the study of the disease at Sunderland. His reflections have, however, been cramped by the form given to them of a report to a local board of health. His introduction contains many judicious remarks upon the nature and propagation of the disease; and the cases present a valuable record of facts for the use of the practitioner. We need not say much upon Dr. M'Cabe's work: it is another of those useless productions which perhaps never abounded so much upon any subject as on this. The author says, the malady is always preceded by dense fogs: we suspect this information will not be very agreeable to the Londoners, supposing that the statement of facts were met with avidity, where a proper scepticism to the operation of solitary causes has been converted into a denial capable of entailing the most ruinous consequences.

The Album Wreath, Nos. V. and VI. Willoughby.

WE are glad to see that this very pretty design prospers, and that these Nos. are improvements on their predecessors. The plan of selected poems, short prose sentences, &c., is far better, in our opinion, than that of original contributions. The probability is, that the latter would be trash, while the former may embody a world of beautiful and fugitive pieces.

THE author's "Thoughts on Illustrious Personages," though a small volume, is at once beautiful, amusing, and instructive. It contains a great deal of historical anecdote and information, and is written in a very elegant and flowing style. And we prize it the more, because, while in most other modern languages we are inundated with books for youth, in the Italian, the graceful and pleasing, we have a dearth of productions which may be placed hefore the student as models of composition.

WE expressed ourselves in terms of high approbation of the former numbers of this Miscellany, as a collection of valuable facts in a noble and endearing science. The sixth part, without the variety of its predecessors, possesses at least their originality; and the biographical notice of the late Captain Dugald Carmichael, by the Rev. Colin Smith, which occupies almost the whole of the number, is replete with interesting and novel facts, and characterised as the record of a naturalist by heart rather than by profession, who had the gift of sound judgment, and a most discursive observation. This memoir contains interesting details of a visit to Algoa Bay, of its people, and of its produc-tions; accounts of Mauritius, the Isles of France and of Bourbon, at which latter island the narrative terminates, to be continued in a future number.

Spinal Deformities cured and prevented. By P. G. Hamon. 8vo. pp. 132. London, 1832. Carpenter and Co.

MR. HAMON was some time partner of Captain Clias, by whom gymnastic exercises are stated to have been introduced into this country, under the patronage of his royal highness the late Duke of York; and by these exercises, adapted to the age, strength, and peculiar conformation of each pupil, he proposes at once to prevent and cure spinal deformities. The author complains that many, having made themselves acquainted with the mechanical part of the exercises, have established themselves in practice; when, as he very properly remarks, that the first and most important requisite in a professor is the knowledge which prevents their misapplication; and thus, he states, that the pursuit of his system has fallen into disrepute. The fact is, that we can never expect uniformity of success from similar treatment where the causes are so numerous; but we still recommend a perusal of Mr. Hamon's pamphlet, which is rendered more intelligible by some rather inferior lithographic plates, but offer a good body of information on orthopedic and gymnastic exercises, which, from the simplicity of details, can be practised by the student without any further tuition.

Woman, in her Social and Domestic Character. By Mrs. John Sandford. 12mo. pp. 172. London, 1831. Longman and Co.

TAKE the following passage as a sample of the truth and observation which pervade this little

"Where want of congeniality impairs domestic comfort, the fault is generally chargeable on the female side; for it is for woman, not for man, to make the sacrifice, especially in indifferent matters. She must, in a certain degree, be plastic herself, if she would mould others. And this is one reason why very good women are sometimes very uninfluential. They do a great deal, but they yield nothing; they are impassable themselves, and therefore they cannot affect others. They proceed so mecha-nically in their vocation, and are so frigid to every thing beyond it, that their very virtue seems automatical, and is uninteresting because it appears compulsory. Negative goodness, therefore, is not enough. With an imperturbable temper, a faultless economy, an irreproachable demeanour, a woman may be still far from engaging, and her discharge of family relations be compatible with much domestic dulness. And the danger is, lest this dryness alienate affection which sympathy might have secured, and nullify an influence which might otherwise have been really beneficial. To be useful, a woman must have feeling. It is this which suggests the thousand nameless amenities which fix her empire in the heart, and render her so agreeable, and almost so necessary, that she imperceptibly rises in the domestic circle, and becomes at once its cement and its charm. If it be then really her wish to increase her hold on the affections, and to mature able production.

the sentiment which passion may have excited, let her not forget that nothing conduces more to these results than congeniality. Perhaps conjugal virtue was never more aptly panegyrised than in the following eulogy on a matron of the last century :-- 'She was a lady of such symmetrical proportion to her husband, that they seemed to come together by a sort of natural magnetism.' "

There is much good taste and good feeling in these pages, which well exemplify one of their own very gracefully turned remarks; viz. that " elegance is poetry put into action."

An Introductory Lecture, delivered in King's College, London, Nov. 2d, 1831. By A. Bernays, Professor of the German Language and Literature to the College. Fellowes.

This preliminary discourse contains a brief history of the rise and progress of German literature; an exposition of the advantages to be derived from the study of the German language; and a description of the means by which Professor Bernays hopes to be able to carry into effect that which, in a truly liberal and philosophical spirit, he considers to be the chief aim of his efforts; namely, "to call forth, in this country, still kindlier feelings towards Germany, and quicken the literary intercourse be-tween our kindred nations." We are glad to observe the professor's determination "to render all his courses practical, and of immediate application;" for a great deal of time is too frequently wasted in the chairs of our institutions for education, by dissertations, which, however curious in themselves, tend little to further the purpose for which those institutions have been established.

Frederick Wilding; or, the Ways of the World: a Novel. 3 vols. 12mo. London, 1832. Baldwin and Cradock.

OUR author declares that his work was written in consequence of reading Pelham: - curious, that a very witty book should be the origin of a very dull one! It is a great misfortune to literature that imitation should seem so easy, and yet be so difficult. Our best advice to the writer of the Ways of the World will be to entirely alter, or else leave them alone for the future.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

BOYAL COLLEGE OF PHYSICIANS.

SIR H. HALFORD, the president of the College, in the chair. This was the first assembly for the season, and it was attended by a considerable number of distinguished visitors, amongst whom were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London and Chichester, the Dean of Westminster, the Rt. Hon. Sir John Nicholl, Sir J. Macgrigor, Mr. Davies Gilbert, &c. &c. A dissertation on the great plague of Athens, by Dr. Ireland, dean of Westminster, was read by the president. The first introduction of this pestilence into Europe occurred about 430 years B.C., when it made its appearance with great mortality at Athens; where it continued for three years, having been conveyed, as it was believed, from Æthiopia, or some part of the African coast, to that celebrated city, at the time under the sway of Pericles, and devastated by the ravages of the first Peloponnesian war. Both Thucydides and Hippocrates were living at that period, and were attacked, but not fatally, by the disorder. The former, in the second book of his history, has given us, with the Attic vigour and eloquence for which his history of the Peloponnesian war is so much admired, a full account of the appearance and progress of the pestilence. Hippocrates, however, it is to be regretted, has left no statement of the treatment of the disorder, and the means employed for its cure. The disease made its first appearance in the head, and continued its attacks in succession to the lower parts of the body; and it was remarkable that it never terminated fatally in those patients who had already recovered from an attack. The sufferer felt the greatest desire to be entirely uncovered and to remain cool, although the skin externally was only moderately warm. Some patients, while unguarded, escaped and leaped into the wells or other collections of cold water. It is remarked by all the historians, that the years immediately preceding the plague were unusually healthy, and that while it continued it was the only disorder, all others changing their character and becoming converted into it. The Athenians attributed it to a poisoning of the springs; and the idea of poison being in some mode or other the cause of their calamity, was so firmly fixed in their minds, that suspicion existed universally even among the nearest relatives. The author concluded his dissertation with some remarks on the plague at Milan, Marseilles, and London. A call, which we have no doubt will be attended to, was made for a communication on the subject of more modern pestilences.

ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

SIR ROBERT HERON in the chair. - A considerable number of individuals were elected fellows of the Society. From the monthly report of the council, it appeared that the balance in favour of the Society on the month's proceedings, amounted to 5671.; that 3,844 persons had visited the gardens in February, and 536 the museum. The minutes of the premium committee were also read. It was not considered expedient by the committee to hold out a premium for any improvement in zoology already rewarded by any other scientific body; that the Society itself could not rank as a candidate for the premiums; and that these should be given for improvements and importations of British grouse, African bustard, Asiatic pheasants, and certain birds of New Holland be fixed hereafter. Some discussion arose upon a recommendation of the council to allow at were from Roman history. They are articles it detracts nothing from that relating to the the office in Bruton Street the sale of tickets of admission to the gardens on Sunday, after one the last age, erroneously considered to be others. o'clock. A number of fellows, amongst whom was the chairman objected to it, as likely to introduce a too miscellaneous company on that day; and further, that the Society, ought to derive none of its revenue from Sunday visitors. It was arranged that the recommendation should be referred to the council for reconsideration. It was stated that the Society's young lion was in a very dangerous state from inflammation of the eyes.

ROYAL SOCIETY.

H. R. H. the Duke of Sussex in the chair .-The second part of Dr. Marshall Hall's paper was read. The author having, in the first portion of this memoir, investigated the changes which take place in a given quantity of atmospheric air from the breathing of an included animal, by means of very ingenious and adequate apparatus, in which caustic potash is employed to absorb the carbonic acid formed, and indicate consequently the quantity of oxygen abstracted from the air, and having deduced the ratio which subsists between the quantity of respiration and the irritability of the heart, proceeds to lay before the Society the results of his researches connected with that peculiar sleep and torpidity of certain animals, so long an object of interest with naturalists, and, from its occurring during the winter season, termed hibernation. He first inquires into the nature of the sleep of these animals, and considers it wholly distinct from that of animals not hibernating; and then details the peculiarities of true hibernation, and of the irritability and sensibility of hibernating animals. He ascertains, by experiment, the nature of the respiratory functions during the continuance of the animals in this state, and finds that no oxygen is absorbed from the air, and the respiration is almost entirely suspended; while, at the same time, the heart, from its irritability, maintains its action and the circulation. The temperature of animals while in this state is, like inanimate matter, only equal to that of the surrounding atmosphere, but rapidly attains a blood-heat on the animals being roused into activity. The author found that it might, without any injurious effect, be immersed in water from ten to fifteen minutes, while an immersion for three minutes is sufficient to destroy the animal if in an active state. The experiments were made chiefly on bats, hedgehogs, and dormice; and the author's inquiries modify the theories of Hunter, Edwards, and other physiologists who have written on this subject.

Captain Beaufort, R.N. F.R.S. presented, on the part of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, a complete copy of the Admiralty charts for the library of the Society; and George Rennie, Esq. V.P.R.S. presented three quarto vols. of MS. notes taken by his late celebrated father while a student attending the lectures of Dr. Black at Edinburgh.

The monk Navara, on whose testimony Kircher published the singular inscription given below, asserted that there was a tradition among the Arabs in his time, that the writing was cut by the prophet Jeremiah, and that the letters indicate where that prophet had concealed the sacred vessels belonging to the temple. We read in 2d Maccab. ii. "It is found in the records, that when Jeremy came thither, (i. e. to Mount Sinai) he found a hollow cave, wherein he laid the tabernacle, and the ark, and the altar of incense, and so stopped the door. And some of them that followed him came to mark the way, but they could not find it; which, when Jeremy perceived, he blamed them, saying, 'As for that place, it shall be unknown until the time that God gather his people again together, and receive them into mercy." This tradition being well known to the Jews, it is not unreasonable to suppose that, actuated by a superstitious zeal, they might have proceeded, on many occasions, in large numbers, to the mountains, which they inscribed with holy invocations and expressions of piety, in the hope of discovering a passage to the cave wherein the prophet had hidden those precious national trea sures, under the persuasion that, upon their finding it, "God would receive them into mercy, and would gather his people again to-gether." Should this supposition be correct, although many of the inscriptions bear marks of still higher antiquity, others may be referred to the age of the Maccabean princes.

Another opinion worthy of consideration is that the inscriptions are in part sepulchral and were engraved by the surviving friends of a multitude of persons of various nations. who perished together among the mountains by some common calamity. We find a probable occasion of such a catastrophe in this neighbourhood, in the passage through the mountains, for several successive days, of a countless multitude of people of different nations, who, in the year 640, were sent by the Caliph Omar into Egypt, with an immense train of camels, to fetch corn for the inhabitants of Arabia, then suffering from extreme scarcity. Great numbers of these persons, oppressed by famine, and goaded on by the sword of their fierce conquerors, are likely to have perished on the route. What especially recommends this hypothesis to consideration is, the variety of anomalies found among the inscriptions; a circumstance inexplicable upon any philological principle. It further offers a probable explanation of the figures of loaded camels frequently occurring on these monuments. Several convents have existed from an early period in the vicinity, and the mountains formerly swarmed with hermits. Thévenot says, that in Mount Hor alone there were above 14,000. This fact, coupled with the inscriptions found upon loose stones, may be regarded as strengthening the probability that many of the records are sepulchral, though

ROYAL ASIATIC SOCIETY.

RIGHT HON. C. W. W. WYNNE in the chair. Lady Chambers presented a very valuable collection of works connected with oriental literature, formerly the property of the late Sir R. Chambers, president of the Asiatic Society in Bengal. It comprises part of the works of Avicenna, printed in Arabic at Rome, 1593; Erpenii Grammatica Arabica, and Raphelengii Lexicon Arabicum; Elmacini Historia Saracenica, by Erpenius; Life of Saladin, in Latin, by Schultens; Hinckelmann's edition of the Koran, 1694; Grotius de Veritate, in Arabic, &c. &c.

The paper read was a description, by Major Henry Burney, British resident in Ava, of the process employed by the Burmese in the manufacture of what is commonly termed lacquered ware; and was intended to illustrate a splendid donation from the same gentleman, laid upon the table at this meeting, comprising specimens of various articles manufactured by the Burmese from the fibres of the bamboo cane, and exhibiting in every stage the method of making drinking-cups, betel-boxes, dinner-boxes, &c. &c. The name of lacquered ware, which has been given to this manufacture, appears to be incorrect, as no lac is used in the process. The principal material is the varnish called theet-tsee, or wood-oil, which is very plentiful in Ava, and of which three sorts are used. Few colours preserve their tint when mixed with this varnish; vermilion answers best; and the Burmese prefer that of their own making to what is imported from China. The varnish being applied with the hand sometimes raises blisters on the skin of the workman, as a remedy! for which they apply a little teak-wood rubbed down with water; as a preventive, they occasionally swallow a little of the varnish. The different figures are etched on the article, while fixed on a lathe, by means of a rude graver; the traces of which are subsequently filled up with vermilion, or whatever colour is preferred. After giving an account of the materials used, the author describes the process of manufacture, as performed by two separate parties of workmen engaged by him expressly for this purpose, and some of whom prided themselves on having manufactured betel-boxes for her majesty the Queen of Ava. In the course of this description, he refers to the various articles which accompanied it, as illustrative of his remarks. Of the drinking-cups there are nine plain specimens, shewing the stages from the first weaving of the basket-work to the finished article, and five others variously ornamented; there are three specimens of the dinner or ricebox, from the rough frame as turned on the lathe, to the article finished with vermilion; six specimens of betel-boxes; a lathe; specimens of the varnish, oil, polishing powders, and every implement used. The total number of articles presented, including seven models of Burmese musical instruments, was fifty-two. The thanks of the Society were ordered to be conveyed to Major Burney for his interesting and curious donation.

Among the visitors present at this meeting were the Prince Czartoriski, whose father was a pupil and friend of Sir William Jones; and Count Neimoewicz, the celebrated poet and historian of Poland.

LONDON UNIVERSITY.

At the annual meeting of the proprietors, &c. of this Institution, on Wednesday, the statement of affairs was somewhat more satisfactory than on late occasions. The capital amounts to 164,852! including 2,377! of donations, of which 157,398l. has been actually received. By economy and attention, it was reported that the prospects of the University might be considered favourable. Of 386 students now attending, 226 belong to the medical classes, which, accordingly, seem alone to have taken a permanent root. 2001. was voted, as a compensation, to Professor Pattison. Mr. Maldon, M.A., and Mr. White, B.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge, and the Rev. Dr. Ritchie, have been severally appointed professors of Greek, mathematics, and natural philosophy, vice Long, De Morgan, and Lardner, resigned. Dr. Carswell was also appointed professor of morbid anatomy, a new class; to aid which he has contributed a fine collection of drawings.

[Fourth Notice.]

No. 333. Sea-shore, with Figures. T. S. Good.—Exquisite.

No. 370. A Philosopher in search of the Wind. R. Farrier.—The blockhead who cut the throat of the goose that laid a golden egg daily, was a Solomon compared with this "Philosopher." We confess that we think the subject a little strained. The expression of the several heads is nevertheless admirable.

No. 374. Llynn Idwell, North Wales—Stormy. T. C. Hofland.—To be placed amidst such gloomy desolation, and apparently so much "out of humanity's reach," must be rather appalling under any circumstances; still more so when surrounded by the fierce strife of the elements. The rugged features and mysterious grandeur of this production are finely contrasted in another by the same artist,—No. 491, The Falls of Terni,—where all is beauty, light, and classical elegance; one of those delicious scenes, which seem made to be illustrated by the pencil of the painter, or the pen of the poet. On the representation of this lovely and romantic spot Mr. Hofland has most successfully employed his best powers. The translucent and silvery tone of the water, in particular, is singularly happy.

No. 382. Cordelia receiving the Account of her Father's Sufferings. W. Boxall.— Notwithstanding the obvious similarity in this performance to that of one who stands high in the ranks of art, there is abundantly sufficient of original talent in it to entitle Mr. Boxall to no slight praise, as regards both composition and expression. The latter is in perfect accordance with the passage quoted from the great dramatist. Mr. Boxall has also been very successful in the Corregio-like pearliness of the half-tints of his flesh.

No. 396. Malmaison; No. 412. Austerlitz. A. Morton.—Two performances of unequal merit; the one representing repose, the other action. The former is very so-so; the latter very clever. While we contemplate it, we can scarcely refrain from asking, with Young,—

"Where the prime actors of the last year's scene;
Their port so proud, their buskin, and their plume?
How many sleep, who kept the world awake
With lustre and with noise!"

No. 397. The Conversion of St. Paul. G. Hayter.—A spirited sketch, well deserving to be made the groundwork of a large and finished picture.

No. 404. Sir Calepine rescuing Serona. W. Hilton, R.A.—It gives us pleasure to see that this admirable performance (which we noticed with the praise due to it on its appearance at Somerset House last year) has found a purchaser, whom we congratulate on the possession of one of the finest works of the English school.

No. 405. Landscape Composition. W. Scrope.

—A clever and classical landscape; exhibiting some of the highest qualities of art.

No. 418. Love the best Physician. Destouches.—We most cheerfully pay our tribute of applause to the talents here displayed by a visiter and a foreigner. The subject, it is true, is rather obsolcte. In these days, when Cupid has learned to cast accounts, even people die of the tender passion; and, indeed, the costume of the picture judiciously indicates that the incident belongs to former times. It is, however, admirably treated by M. Destouches; the drama is perfect; the expression, if a little French, is not the less powerful on that account; and when we say that the style of painting is firm and careful, and much resembles that of our favourite Hogarth, we consider ourselves as bestowing upon it a very high eulogium.

SOUTH ROOM.

No. 435. Transmigration of Souls asserted by Will Honeycomb. T. Clater.—From No. 343 (not No. 383, as stated in the Catalogue) of the Spectator. A graphic illustration of the ingenious hoax practised on a lady by her lover, who addresses a letter to her in the name of her favourite monkey; executed with great skill, as well in the principal as in the subordinate parts.

No. 445. Jacopo Robusti, detto Il Furioso Tintoretto, lecturing his Disciples. T. Von Holst.—Enough is seen of this picture to raise but not to gratify curiosity. A little more brilliance of colouring would have given additional value to a performance which seems to be conceived in a grand style of art.

No. 460. Venus directing the Arrow of Cupid. J. Wood.—The world is tired of subjects of this nature. There is no interest in them, beyond form and colour, in which qualities the present work is not without merit.

No. 461. Casar's Camp, Borkshire. F. H. Henshaw.—We should certainly have pessed over Casar's Camp without notice, but for the singular effect of light, and the chaotic character of the clouds, with which the artist has enriched his performance.

No. 463. A Highland Pass. Miss A. G. Nasmyth.—A very clever example of the picturesque, under a silvery tone of colour.

National Portrait Gallery. No. XXXV. Fisher and Son.

This number contains portraits of Lords Grey, Kenyon (late chief justice), and Gardner, after Lawrence, Shee, and Beechey. The engravings are very fine; that of Earl Grey, by Cochran, in particular. View of Edinburgh; shewing the Communication between the Old and New Town, as proposed by Alexander Trotter, Esq. of Dreghorn. Drawn and engraved by T. K. Shepherd. Colnaghi.

This proposed communication, if adopted by the commissioners for the improvement of Edinburgh, will, in our opinion, add greatly to the beauty of that already magnificent city. Mr. Trotter recommends that the earthen mound which at present connects the two towns, and which is an unsightly mass, distorting the appearance of every edifice seem over it, should be destroyed, and that the new communication should be effected by means of a gently aloping terrace, brought round the north front of the Bank of Scotland, and opening into the High Street, immediately opposite to the Cathedral.

CHOLERA MORBUS.

[Continuing our views of this important subject, the following letters will show how nearly the same motions now performing among ourselves have been previously performed abroad—Ed. L. G.]

THE CHOLERA AT VIENNA.

[From the Letters of a Physician, November 1831.] My companions in the diligence in which I travelled to the Austrian capital consisted of two Jews of Vienna, a Paris dealer in leeches, who emitted the odour of camphor at every pore, and a North German, who had been in Berlin at the time of the cholers there, and had made a very wide circuit to avoid the qua-rantines. At Braunau we saw the Bavarian quarantine, consisting of a number of wooden buildings, the very eight of which was enough to give one the horrors. Rather would I make any détour than spend twenty-one days in such a prison. I had already been informed at Munich of the breaking out of the cholera at Wels, and when we came opposite to that town on the high road, I mentioned our geographical bearings to my fellow-travellers. The Jews started, as if a bomb had burst at their feet, and the agent of the French thérapie thrust his hand into his bosom for his camphor-bag.

When at length the towers and spires of Vienna were seen over-topping the fogs of the Danube, I looked with vivid interest at the famous city which has had to record in her annals so many severe sieges, and so many pestilences, and which must now write in black the year 1831 in her calendar. I could not help emiling, when I recollected how often we were assured from the professor's chair that our prodigious civilisation had for ever banished those harpies, hatched by a tropic sun, leprosy, small-pox, and plague, from the garden of Europe; and that the yellow fever could at the most claim only the sallow native of the Spanish coast for its victim. As it appeared not long since, as though it were possible to convert ancient Europe into a quiet pasture for nations, where the shepherds only made music and the dogs barked, while the financier coolly calculated the annual supply of wool; so the political economist had almost become accustomed to allot to Death his annual budget; and Master Death had settled down into a retail-dealer, whose yearly consumption could be computed to a single head. But bankers now turn ministers; and so the great war-minister of Nature is resolved once more to turn banker, and to do a large stroke of business.

The first sight of the cholera greatly surprised, nay, even shocked me; but it was far from exciting in my mind either timidity or apprehension. I have seen and touched very many persons affected with it, and I have attended many dissections, but never felt the alightest symptom of indisposition. The cholera is an ens sui generis, which has no analogon it is a foreign thing from distant climes; it is very frequent: this still carries off many, and highly pathetic, tragic, while most of our petty maladies are, at the utmost, merely lachrymose. One thing certainly I did not expect, that this oriental would make herself scarce, and that it would cost some trouble to obtain admission to her presence. The disease has been considerably on the decrease for some days past: very marked cases are becoming of rarer occurrence; I am vexed with myself for coming so late, and have made up my mind to proceed shortly to Brünn, or to Grätz, if the disease should break out there. The observation of the cholera here has, moreover, various impediments to encounter: the authorities evade applications for the communication of official documents; access is scarcely allowed to the hospitals, except during the visits of the physicians; the multitude of foreign practitioners is rather a hindrance than a benefit; and, lastly, the number of patients is so small, that you are obliged to seek them out in the most distant parts of the suburbs. But the opportunity of making acquaintance with physicians from every country in Europe -representatives of all the schools-is an interesting addition. The confusion of tongues is extreme; and old St. Stephen's looks gravely down upon the medicinal Babel.

The people of Vienna are now perfectly indifferent to the disorder; but at first the consternation was great, and it was increased by the rigorous police regulations. In the first days every patient was carried to the hospital, and the rich baron died by the side of the menial. With the removal of the blockade and of all restraint, the belief in contagion was suddenly abandoned, and the number of cases diminished, most assuredly because the restored confidence of the people counteracted the principal predisposing cause, depression of spirits. Many sickened and died, at first, at the sound of the hearse; and no vehicles were seen in the deserted streets, besides that and the flying calèches of the physicians, some of whom even prescribed for their patients from the doors of their chambers. For several weeks past, however, things have worn a different aspect. In the general appearance of the town, and the conduct of its inhabitants, I perceive scarcely any other change than that you meet with fewer foreign costumes, and that people smoke in the inner town. The green biers for the conveyance of cholera patients, which appear here and there in the streets-now the only signs of the epidemic-are so far from scaring persons who meet them, that they will not go two steps out of their way. The theatres, the musical réunions and soirées, are numerously frequented. On my journey hither remarked, that the alarm decreased the nearer approached to Vienna. In Upper Austria, in the villages, women and children were to be seen in the streets on their knees, with their faces turned to the east, praying to the "mother of God" to avert the disease. In Linz, little apprehension seemed to be felt; and in Vienna, fear seems to have given place to the other extreme_levity.

Many cases occur in private houses, where the first attack of cholera is repelled by domestic medicines; and the proportion between the number of cases and the mortality is thereby rendered more favourable than it is represented in the newspapers. Notwithstanding the constant intercourse with the neighbouring villages, the progress of the disorder there is very inconsiderable. In spite of the decrease of the epidemic, I have seen some cases which equalconvalescence is always slow; -- since, though the cholera passes off slightly, a nervous state invariably succeeds, in consequence of the congestions towards the head, which take place on the re-establishment of the circulation, and the return of the external warmth. The treatment with ipecacuanha and ice, internally in lave-ments, and externally, the limbs being rubbed singly with ice, and then wrapped in warm blankets, numbers very many adherents, and has many successful cures to adduce.

The good emperor has contributed most materially to revive the confidence of the people, attending the theatre as usual with his family, and daily visiting, even at the worst period, the workmen on the glacis, where thousands of poor people are employed in the erection of an immense edifice for the city police, and for a house of correction. Schönbrunn was not surrounded by troops, according to the original plan, the execution of which was most pertinaciously insisted upon by Prince Metternich, who disputed the point for several days with the emperor. The diplomatic corps had been already removed to the environs of Schönbrunn, and directed to supply itself with three months' provisions: the archdukes were to have been shut up in Schönbrunn, Metternich in the Schwarzenberg palace, and the emperor in the Belvedere. The firmness of emperor in the Belvedere. Francis, supported by Stifft's anti-contagious views, finally triumphed. All restraints were removed, and the communication with Schönbrunn and the court was not interrupted. Only the ordinance was still enforced, that the dead should be carried away at night, in one vehicle, without ceremony, and interred in burial grounds apprepriated to cholera patients. The emperor declared that, if he should be taken off by the disease, he would not form an exception.

The city was divided on this occasion into thirty-two divisions; each of these had a physician and commissary, and was subdivided into several sections, over which there were subordinate commissaries. These had daily to examine house by house, to report such suspicious cases of disease as they discovered to the physician of the division, to enforce cleanliness in the houses and streets, and to inquire into the wants of the inhabitants. The physician made daily reports on the cases of cholera. These extraordinary officers of health have lately been deemed superfluous, and dismissed.

Out of the sixteen cholera hospitals, furnished with great profusion, only ten of which were used, some have been entirely shut up. The usual funeral ceremonies were at first forbidden to be performed for persons who had died of the cholera: all such were removed to the hospitals, whence they were conveyed at night, and buried in particular cometeries beyond the line, twenty in one pit. This was the only coercive measure adopted. For some days past, however, funerals have been permitted, and the relatives come in dozens to the hospitals to fetch the corpset.

The emperor seems to enjoy himself at Schönbrunn; his health is excellent, and he hunts frequently in the park of Laxenburg. The dislike which he formerly manifested for this residence appears to have worn off: this dislike is said to date from the time when Napoleon despatched orders to Vienna from the Gloriette, where he breakfasted.

Let me, by way of conclusion, impress it upon you, that by giving way to fears, and among our diseases. At the sight of it, the led in violence those that occurred in the be- making abundance of preparations, you do no good, but may injure yourself and others: it is a general observation, that people care much less about cholera in places where it is, than in I resolved to follow it into the country, and those which it has not yet visited. It behoves parish authorities to take measures for assisting and conveying to hospitals such of the poor as cannot obtain proper attendance at their own homes. In families in easy circumstances, no particular preparation is required. Above all, miserable; the floor is of clay, and the prothe idea of laying in a stock of medicaments of every kind, which threatens to clear out the apothecaries' shops, is absurd and superfluous. Tea, salep, almonds for drink, good vinegar, juniper-wood, are the most necessary articles, and they are always at hand. Very little is required for the treatment of cholera: for the lighter cases a simple treatment is best, for the desperate ones there is no specific.

On coming hither from Vienna, the cholera appears to the observer in a different, a more grave, and more austere form, than in the capital, though the disease is intrinsically the same. There are quarters of the town where not a house has been spared; and these, as in other places, are precisely such as are situated near the water, and to which the inundation in September extended. Not a few victims have been snatched away from among the higher classes, though the majority certainly belong to the lower. In the hospitals, the number of work-people belonging to the cloth manufactories, which are mostly damp, is remarkably great.

A visible alarm prevails here; nobody goes out at night, unless in case of necessity. At first, many people had recourse to preservatives, especially plasters, and plates of copper applied to the stomach; but they were soon discarded as useless and troublesome. The cholera has here furnished an additional proof of the fallacy of creeds founded on the almanac and the barometer: the bad weather, which has set in, has had no influence upon the disease, but so much the more was it affected by the vintage and the church feasts. Never did the state of civilisation, and the nature of a disease, so powerfully concur to render an epidemic a most impressive monitor to men, to rouse them from their fondness for sensual indulgences, and to force them to reflect on what is beneficial to themselves. He who tries the hearts and reins seems disposed for once to try the stomach also. As the English temperance societies send emissaries over the country to preach up a crusade against gin and whisky, so the cholera, Heaven's own apostle of temperance, is making the tour of the globe; and it will, no doubt, effect a more speedy and complete moral reform. by the cleansing of the prime via, than those foes to spirituous liquors, through the medium of the obtuse brain.

An observation made every where else has been verified here, namely, that the cholera, in its severest form, proves fatal, almost without exception. Besides the cholera, there is but little sickness at Brünn; and chronic complaints are much slower than usual in their progress. I am thoroughly convinced, that if the cholera has occasionally been contagious, still its diffusion on a large scale depends on general causes. The establishment of cordons about countries, towns, or houses, is of no use; nay, it can only serve, by its moral effect upon the inhabitants, to aggravate the disease; and I hope that with you there will be no more talk of a manœuvre which reminds one too strongly of the peasants who went out with muskets against a swarm of locusts.

Tischnowitz, in Moravia: middle of December.

As the epidemic began to subside at Brünn have fixed my quarters in this place, where I enjoy excellent opportunities of making myself acquainted with Moravia and its inhabitants. The people are very poor, and in a very low stage of civilisation. Their huts are small and digious stove occupies one-fourth of the space. In such a hole dwell perhaps a dozen persons they sleep some upon a wall behind the stove, and others in filthy beds; their chief, and frequently their only, food consisting of potatoes and turnips. Conceive what must be the effect of cholera under such circumstances. Though it has no very marked character in the country, still it carries off great numbers: there are parishes in which it has proved fatal to 1 in 6 of the population. In these wretched habi-tations the corpses are often left till their interment. You may enter huts where a couple of dead bodies are lying in one corner, and three or four sick in the others. I was lately in a village where the disease had just broken out. In the cottage attacked by it almost half of the small room was occupied by a loom, and this, together with two beds, the colossal stove, table, and benches, left scarcely space enough for one to stir. This place was inhabited by fifteen persons; three were already dead of the cholera; a fourth lay without hope of recovery. I opened the bodies in the passage, while the wind blew the snow in, and geese and hogs were going to and fro.

As yet we have in the country but little evidence in favour of contagion. At Brünn the first cases occurred among the soldiers brought from the Hungarian cordon to the military hospital of that town; and the first patient of the civil class was a young woman who lived near the hospital, and had a sweetheart there; and the second a female friend, who attended her during her illness. It is very difficult to come at facts of this kind, because the government, in contradiction to the Prussian, which decreed the cholera to be contagious, insists that it is not contagious, and its officers act accordingly. "If," said a physician to me in the genuine Austrian style, "you would dis-tinguish yourself in your own country, you must uphold its miasmatic diffusion."

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

THE GARRICK CLUB PAPERS, NO. IV.

On Thursday the annual general meeting of the Garrick Club took place; the Earl of Mulgrave, President, in the chair. The laws and regulations by which the Society is to be go- thing else, is not bankrupt in wit. Recently verned were read and agreed to. The house one of the inferior judges, whose salaries are, having been found most commodious, power by the act, to be paid out of the fees, seeing was given to the committee to elect a hundred that the whole amount was absorbed by the members in addition to the original three hundred. The accounts, &c., were laid on the "Upon my word, R., I begin to think that table, and from every thing it appeared that the Club was flourishing and prosperous, and bade fair to realise the best hopes of its founders. Honourable Conduct. - In connexion with the theatrical world, in which, we regret to confess, there is often too much of trickery and deceit, it affords us a high satisfaction to make public mention of the honourable conduct of an individual whose affairs have unfortunately had too much notoriety. We allude to Mr. Price, the late lessee of Drury Lane Theatre; and we presume to think that our statement cannot be considered as in the slightest degree encroaching upon private transactions—an offence of which, we trust, the Literary Gazette will never be guilty. At the period of Mr. Price's misfortune, when the affairs of Drury Lane came to a crisis, we were among those who heard, with much pain, the manager loudly and viru-lently condemned by many who had partaken largely of his hospitalities and favours-his boon companions at the table, his flatterers as a dramatic potentate, his apparent friends in every thing. It was the common way of the world, however; he was the stricken deer, and every one had a barb to aim at his heart and character. It might be just, but we were sure it was cruel; and we (never on intimate terms, though having met him agreeably in society) most sincerely pitied Mr. Price, both for the ill turn his speculation had taken, and for the obloguy to which it exposed him. Well, he was driven into bankruptcy, and after some time left England, covered with the odium of owing debts which he ought never to have contracted, and which he could not pay—guilt neither to be excused nor pardoned in this liberal, commercial, and law-ridden land. The Yankee was gone, having taken in friends and associates-he was gone never to return :- such was the language of the day, the talk of his quondam fellows; and hardly a voice was lifted to whisper a doubt of his not being quite so criminal-of his not deserving so utter a condemnation. To the honour of human nature, and to his own honour, be it recorded, that Mr. Price has, with all possible speed, returned to London, and, out of his own proper funds, liquidated every farthing he owed!! Among his debts, one for which he was most censured was that of a thousand pounds borrowed from Mr. Cooper-a man much esteemed, both as an actor and in private life:—this has been repaid with full interest. The same may be stated with respect to all the rest of Mr. Price's obligations; and even where death had removed the claimant, and there was none to represent him, this worthy individual has sought out the nearest relatives, and insisted on their receiving the amount.

Can we do better than make this noble behaviour generally known, as a lesson to all men to be less prone to censure others—as an example to all men to meet misfortune and undeserved contumely with patience and fortitude, and to shew by their most speaking acts, how strong their conscience made them, and how much they were truly above the thoughtlessness which impugned, or the malignity which assailed them. We close with a tribute of dearer applause than ever theatre afforded him, and affix to this the name of STEPHEN PRICE!

The same humorous judge had listened to a very long argument on a particular case in which the counsel rested much upon a certain act of Parliament. His opponent replied, "You need not rely on that act, for its teeth "You need not rely on that act, for its teeth have been drawn by so many decisions against it, that it is worth nothing." Still the counsel acted. Mrs. Waylett gets more charming argued on, and insisted on its authority; after listening to which for a good hour, his lordship drily remarked, "I do believe all the teeth of this act have been drawn, for there is nothing left but the jaw."

"Is it true that a number of new peers are to be made?" "Yes; I understand the House of Lords is really to be de-graded."

DRAMA.

KING'S THEATRE.

SATURDAY. Il Barbiere .- Another night of comparative misery, and we obliged to become accessaries to murder; for never do we recollect to have heard any music, good, bad, or indifferent, so hacked. We see no reason to change our former opinion of Albertine, -she was barely passable; and Curioni, as the Count, as tame as ever. Piozzi, as Basil, a début, reversed the old proverb, "little and good." Galli, as Figaro, was the only one of whom it is possible to say a word of praise; and though he exhibited rather too much animal vivacity, his execution of the music was unimpeachable.

After the opera, La Somnambule, with Lecompte as La Somnambule, which she played, or rather danced, with much spirit. One dance in particular was as light and as pretty as the most fastidious could wish, and strongly reminded us of the "queen of the dance, Taglioni. If we could find fault, it is that her dance, whilst artless, is too animated, and wants the same dreamy stillness as her walk.

Tuesday. Elisa e Claudio. - An unexpected and therefore a more delightful treat. Never was weary ear more rejoiced than ours by Mercadanti's pretty opera of Elisa e Claudio, admirably sung and well acted. Meric, the Elisa, more than fulfilled the expectations we had formed of her, both as an actress and cantatrice. She gave the music with a simpleness and sweetness that reminded us strongly of Veluti, especially in the air beginning Vado - sente; and in the finale, Figli - sposo. The duet with the Marquess was also extremely fine. Mariani, the Count, as his voice becomes used to the house, looses much of his coarseness; and we find that he can act and sing with good emphasis and feeling. In the concerted pieces his time is a great acquisition. Galli, as the Marquess, was less lively than on Saturday, and consequently better. With respect to the debutant, Monsieur Arnaud, we are sorry to say, Ah! no! The Somnambule was repeated, and Lecompte was in her dance deservedly encored. With such performances as these, the Opera ought to be prosperous; and we are heartily glad to see the public favour so justly deserved.

STRAND THEATRE.

WE are happy to see the exertions of the pro-prietors of this "minor" likely to be crowned every night.

On Thursday Captain Bell, an amateur we believe, and part proprietor of this theatre, tried a cast. He is too tall for so small a house, and withal too inexperienced for any stage.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE first concert of the season took place on Monday. The principal novelties were con-certos of Mr. J. Field, a pupil of Clementi, who has been twenty years in Russia, and is accounted the first pianist in the north of Europe. He displayed first-rate abilities in style, tone, and expression. A Mr. Bohrer also made a very successful debut with the violin.

VARIETIES.

Navarino. - A panorama of the battle of Navarino is among the latest Parisian novelties.

Earthquake. — An earthquake, the shock of which was in the direction of N. to S. was experienced on the 20th of January in Germany, upon a rather extended scale.

St. Simoniens .-- It appears that the expenses of the St. Simonien Society during the month of January last amounted to 112,317 fr. 92 c.; about 4,6801. sterling; a sum which indicates considerable activity and exertion.

The Ladye Chapel. - This ancient and interesting structure has not only been preserved, but the zeal of the friends of science having once been excited, it has been carried before a committee of the House of Commons (by 17 votes to 3) to extend the open space at the east end of St. Saviour's Church 130 feet. It is perfectly delightful to see even one object rescued from the degrading fangs of the poundsshillings-and-pence-men.

Torture in Hanover. - We have no doubt that our kind-hearted Sovereign would be as much surprised and shocked as any of his British subjects, to be informed that the actual torture is still applied at this day to extort confession from criminals in his good kingdom of Hanover. This astounding fact we learn from a German periodical work of high repute, entitled, Annalen der deutschen und auslän-dischen Kriminal - Rechtspflege — Annals of Criminal Jurisprudence, German and foreign published at Berlin, and edited by the Criminal-Director Hitzig. In the first volume of this publication for 1831, are reported several trials which took place in the Hanoverian dominions, and which furnish authentic evidence of the existence of the torture. It is there called by the modest appellations of the verbal and the real territion. The former threatens the torture, which the latter really inflicts. Their relation to each other appears from the following instance: - A woman had been brought by means of the verbal territion to confess that she had committed a theft. She subsequently recalled this confession, as one that had been forced from her. No regard was that had been forced from her. No regard was paid to this contradiction, and she was sentenced to confinement in the house of correction, because a recantation cannot be valid unless the real territion has been applied. craft in Hanover.

M. Ladvocat.—The Parisian booksellers have just sustained a severe misfortune in the person of one of their members, M. Ladvocat. Having in vain, since the revolution of July, contended against the elements of ruin which pressed upon him on all sides, he has at length sunk under the weight of above fifty bankruptcies. Le Livre des Cent-et-un, that manifold proof of the interest taken by French literature in a man who has spent his life in labouring for its prosperity, instead of saving the house of Ladvocat, has precipitated its destruction, though it is believed that the publication of this work will not be interrupted. Thucyclides, illustrated with very limited section and also a needed section of the control of the section and also a needed section. In the foregoing Work it has been the especial aim of the author to ascertain the true interpretation, not only by a diligent use of all the best Modern Commentators, but by exploring the fountain heads of interpretation, as found in the Ancient Fathers, and the Gireck Commentators. Every opposite illustration of phrase, look of the Classical and Rabhinical Illustrators, has been selected, and many thousands of original ones have been added. The very valuable matter derived from the above sources has been carefully arranged and digested. With the whole is a Series of critical remarks, intended the whole is described to the student amidst the Griginal Annotations, in which the true reacting is in important cases, discussed, the course of reasoning indicated, and in general whatever seemed, the course of reasoning indicated, and in general whatever seemed, the course of reasoning indicated, and in general whatever seemed necessary to complete the Corpus Exgegezoe, is supplied by the editor.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

A Description of a singular aboriginal Race, inhabiting the Summit of the Neilgherry Hills, or Blue Mountains of Coimbatoor, in the Southern Peninsula of India. By Capt. H. Harkness. 8vo. pp. 175. London, 1832. Smith, Elder, and Co.

In the Blue Mountains of Coimbatoor are the remains of several Asiatic nations, or tribes; one of which, the Tudas, is especially distinct, even to the present day, from any other Indian people. Extremely simple and patriarchal in their manners, remarkable in their language, and interesting in their customs and traditions, we are much indebted to Capt. Harkness for having rescued them from their obscurity, and, ere their scanty numbers are lost in the surrounding multitude of population, placing them before our eyes and preserving their memory.

The Neilgherry Hills, which form the nucleus of the eastern and western ghauts, lie between the parallels of 11° and 12° north lat. and 76° and 77° east long.; and are bounded by the table-land of Mysore, the Carnatic, &c. Partaking of both monsoons, their temperature is equable, though at an elevation of five thousand feet. Their greatest length is forty-two miles, from w.E. to s.w., and their medium breadth fourteen miles. Several peaks attain the height of above eight thousand feet. The principal European settlement upon them is Oatacamund, whence the author took his excursions, the accounts of which furnish the following extracts.

" The appearance of the Tudas, who may be considered the original inhabitants of the hills, is certainly very prepossessing. Generally above the common height, athletic, and well made, their bold bearing and open and expressive countenances lead immediately to the conclusion, that they must be of a different race to their neighbours of the same hue; and the question naturally arises,—Who can they be? They never wear any covering to the head, whatever the weather may be, but allow the hair to grow to an equal length, of about six or seven inches; parted from the centre or crown, it forms into natural bushy circlets all round, and at a short distance more resembles some artificial decoration, than the simple adornment of nature. The hair of the face also is allowed a similar freedom of growth, and in every instance, except from the effect of age, it is of a jet black, and of the same degree of softness as that of the natives of the low country. A large, full, and speaking eye, Roman nose, fine teeth, and pleasing contour, having occasionally the appearance of great gravity, but seemingly ever ready to fall into the expression of cheerfulness and good humour, are natural-marks, prominently distinguishing them from all other natives of India. They usually wear small gold earrings, some of them a studded chain of silver round the neck, and rings of an upper one or mantle, which covers every part except the head, legs, and occasionally the right arm. These are left bare, the folds of the mantle terminating with the left shoulder, over which the bordered end is allowed to hang loosely. When in a recumbent or sitting position, this mantle envelops them entirely; and for the night, as well as for the day, it is their only clothing. They wear no sandals, nor any kind of protection to the feet or legs; carry no weapon of defence, of the use of which, indeed, they seem to have no notion; but in the right hand, a small rod or wand, which they use, not so much to assist them in walking, as in the management of their herds, &c. The women are of a stature proportionate to that of the men, but of complexion generally some shades lighter, the consequence perhaps of less exposure to the weather. With a strongly feminine cast of the same expressive features as the men, most of them, and particularly the younger, have beautiful long black tresses, which flow in unrestrained luxuriance over the neck and shoulders. With a modest and retiring demeanour, they are perfectly free from the ungracious and menial-like timidity of the generality of the sex of the low country; and enter into conversation with a stranger, with a confidence and self-possession becoming in the eyes of Europeans, and strongly characteristic of a system of manners and customs widely differing from those of their neighbours. The wear necklaces of twisted hair or black thread. with silver clasps, and here and there a bead, and suspended to them bunches of cowry shells, which hang down from the back of the neck between the shoulders. On the arms, immediately above the elbow, they wear a pair of armlets of brass, those of the right arm being much larger than those of the left; silver bracelets are on the wrists; and on the fingers and thumbs of each hand a number of rings of various descriptions. They also wear a zone round the waist, composed of a sort of chainwork, of either silver or a mixed metal resembling brass. Their upper garment, or mantle, resembles that of the men; but it is worn differently, and, reaching to the feet, envelops the whole frame. This attire is by no means graceful; it gives them an unfeminine and mummy-like appearance; and neither they nor the men having any pretensions to cleanliness, this wrapper is, from that circumstance, often rendered still more unseemly. They are, how-ever, a lively, laughter-loving race; and in the sudden transition and free expression of their sentiments, shew a strength of feeling, and correctness of thought, little to be expected under such a garb."

Such is their general description; and we could almost fancy that it was that of one of the earliest divisions of our earth.

"Their life (it is added) being in every respect a pastoral one, they do not congregate in towns or villages, but every family, or the prinof the same description on the hand. Their cipal branches of each family, live separately; dress consists of a short under-garment, folded and these places of their residence are called round the waist, and fastened by a girdle; and morrts (i.e. homes).

"The only articles which the Tudas produce are butter and ghee; such of the latter as they do not require for their own consumption, they dispose of to some of the neighbouring tribes, who transport it to the low country. Early in the morning, or rather as soon as the sun has risen, the herd is liberated from the Tu-el (a sort of pen-fold), and the calves, which during the night have been confined in a separate pen, are allowed to join them. The milking is now commenced by one, two, or more of the males of the family or community, who have gone through certain purifications in order to qualify themselves to perform this duty. After this the herd is allowed to graze about in the vicinity of the morrt, and these dairymen now convert the milk which had been drawn off the preceding evening, into butter, &c., set aside so much of the milk now drawn as is intended for this purpose also, and with the remainder and a little of the butter-milk of the preceding evening, mix up a beverage, of which they and the whole family partake. Of this there is generally a superfluity, which is carefully set aside for the use of the family during the day, or for that of any stranger or visitant who may come to the morrt.

"Towards evening the herd draw together around the morrt, and as they approach the Tu-el, the whole of the family, male and female, make them a kind of obeisance, by bringing up the right hand to the head, the thumb lying along the nose, the hand open, and fingers expanded. The evening repast, consisting of different preparations of milk, meal, parched grain, and butter, has now been prepared; and this over, the lamp is lighted, the same obeisance paid to it as to the herd, and the family retire to rest. Evidently of a peaceful character, having no weapon of defence, no fastening to their dwellings further than the little door previously mentioned, (for, situated as their morrts are, they cannot be said to have sought it either from the forest or morass;) no protection against the wild beasts of the field, not even the nightly guardian or common watch-dog; living rather in families than in societies, without any of those bonds of union which man in general is induced to form, from a sense of common danger, or to guard against the oppression of his neighbours; and, as previously mentioned, migrating from one part of the hills to another, the Tudas pass their days in a manner quite peculiar to themselves, and apparently in all the silence, quiet, and rural simplicity, characteristic of a patriarchal government and a pastoral life.

"Like the natives of the low country, they call falsehood one of the worst of vices, and they have a temple dedicated to truth; but I fear that both the temple and its object are but too often forgotten. Report also speaks of their following some barbarous customs, particularly that of infanticide. Few in number, those arrived at the age of puberty not exceeding six hundred, and apparently a remnant of some tribe driven by religious persecution to seek safety in these mountains, they may have been taught by experience that it is wiser for them to live in fellowship, or quiescent submission, than to provoke hatred or hostility. They, however, assert a claim to the soil, and declare that it was only by their sufferance that the other tribes came to reside on it; that they receive from them a payment in kind, not, however, for so many kaunies or acres, but for such or such a spot, measuring it with the eye: an indefinite sort of demarcation, which, where land is so plentiful, and the inhabitants so few, is not attended with any inconvenience."

The tribes here alluded to are called Marves (a timid race of Hindus), Curbs, Erulars, &c. into whose peculiarities it is not necessary for us to enter; as, though there is a good deal curious in them, they are evidently mixed races, and consequently less interesting subjects of inquiry than the Tudas themselves; respecting whom the subjoined is most worthy of observation.

"Their language, the pronunciation of which is deeply pectoral, appears to be quite distinct from the languages of the surrounding countries. With the Sanscrit it has not the least affinity, in roots, construction, or sound; and, if I may venture to say so, as little with any other Asiatic language of the present day. It may, perhaps, be said to have some resemblance to the vernacular Hindu languages of the peninsula, but only in so far as these languages still possess simple words not of Sanscrit origin; and the Tamil possessing by far the greatest number of such words, the resemblance to it is consequently greatest. There are also two sounds, the sha and the ukh, which are of constant occurrence in the Tuda, and which, in respect to the vernacular languages of the illustration of manners. plain, are peculiar to the Tamil, and its sister dialect, the Malayal'ma. Besides these, the pronouns, the plural, the honorary termination of verbs, and the negative verb, come nearer to the Tamil than to any of the other dialects. With these exceptions, however, it differs widely, and bears so little affinity in genius, either to it or to any of the dialects of the present day, that although these hills have now been the seat of the principal collector's cutcherry for the last ten years, there is no instance of its having been acquired by any one of the native servants, sufficiently for them to understand the expression of the simplest occurrence. The other tribes also who inhabit these hills, a circumstance still more surprising, have not become conversant with it.

"They have no written character, nor any visible symbol by which to communicate their thoughts; and the language being merely oral, it is of course the more difficult to acquire Whether this language has always been oral, or whether it may not at one time have had an alphabet, is, I think, doubtful. They express surprise at the process of writing, either with the pen or stylus; and the loose manner in which individuals pronounce the same words, would seem to prove that, if they ever had a character, or any kind of standard to their language, it has been long lost to them."

The account of a Těriri, or temple, shews the simplicity of their religious worship: it is dedicated to Truth-and Cant. H. savs.

"There is not, however, any representation or idol; but the temple, or the place, being considered most sacred, the Tudas affirm that they would not for a moment hesitate to believe whatever declaration was seriously made there by any of their tribe. This temple is of a conical form, the thatch very neatly put on, and surmounted at the top with a stone about a foot in diameter. The walls, door-way, interior, &c., are much the same as those of one of their sacred dairies, but the space within is considerably less. There are three or four bells in this temple, to which libations of milk are occasionally made; but, excepting these, there is nothing else, either sacred or profane; and neither here, in their sacred dairies, nor in any other place appropriated to sacred purposes, is there the semblance even of an altar. On leaving it I remarked that the Tudas remained behind and on looking towards them from among the trees, observed that the two old men were in prayer, standing in front of the temple, with the right hand up to the face, in the manner before described; but what particularly attracted my attention was, that they were not addressing themselves to the temple, but to the heavens."

Women have several husbands, with whom they live a month at a time alternately; and their marriage customs and laws of succession, it may well be believed, appear singular enough to European ideas. Their funeral rites are also extraordinary: and we reserve the descrip-tion of one of them as a future and curious

When on the subject of Indian hills we take the opportunity of noticing an account of the convalencent station of Malcolm Pait, near Bombay, originally published in India, and reprinted in London. This pamphlet of thirty pages describes, in an interesting manner, this Bombay retreat on the Mahabuleahwar table-land, equal to the Neightires of Madras, and the Himalayah of Bengal, for the restoration of the European constitution. These hills, full of natural and vegetable beauty, were first resorted to for health by Lieut-Col. Lodwick, in 1824; but for the establishment of the village of Malcolm Pait, with all its conveniences and appliances for the benefit of invalids, the presidency of Bombay is indebted to the enlightened real and activity of Sir John Malcolm. Already it has assumed the comforts and snjoyments of an English place for convalescent resort; fine mutton from the Dekhun, excellent beef and poultry from the Koukun, a liberal . When on the subject of Indian hills we take the opexcellent beef and poultry from the Dekhun, excellent beef and poultry from the Koukun, a liberal supply of imported articles, a reading-room, roads, &c. &c., all contribute to render the station as agreeable as it is important to our countrymen, when suffering from the climate of India.

My Old Portfolio; or, Tales and Sketches. By Henry Glassford Bell. 12mo. pp. 310. London, 1832. Smith, Elder, and Co.

A very various and amusing volume, and giving a promise of better things, which makes us regret the declaration of the author, that he sees "every prospect of being occupied, for years to come, with studies of an abstract and severer nature." A keen perception of the ridiculous, an overflowing of the buoyant spirits of youth, a deep feeling of natural beauty, and a creative and wild fancy, are the characteristics of a mind which seems to us rather to have tried its wings than its powers in these pages. The "Dead Daughter" is a beautiful specimen of the supernatural; but commend us to "Mynheer von Wodenblock" (though in print before): it is equally playful and original, to say nothing of the attraction of the horrible. But let our readers judge for themselves.

" He who has been at Rotterdam will remember a house of two stories, which stands in the suburbs just adjoining the basin of the canal running between that city and the Hague, Leyden, and other places. I say he will remember it, for it must have been pointed out to him as having been once inhabited by the most ingenious artist that Holland ever produced, to say nothing of his daughter, the prettiest maiden ever born within hearing of the croaking of a frog. It is not with the fair Blanche, unfortunately, that we have at present any thing to do; it is with the old gentleman, her father. His profession was that of a surgical-instrument maker; but his fame principally rested on the admirable skill with which he constructed wooden and cork legs. So great was his reputation in this department of human science, that they whom nature or accident had curtailed, caricatured, and disappointed in so very necessary an appendage to the body, came limping to him in crowds, and, however desperate their case might be, were very soon (as the saying is) set upon their legs again. Many a cripple, who had looked upon his deformity as incurable, and whose only consolation consisted in an occasional hit at Providence, for having intrusted his making to a journeyman, found himself so admirably fitted, so elegantly propped up by Mynheer Turningvort, that he almost began to doubt whether a timber or cork supporter was not, on the whole, superior to a more common-place and troublesome one of flesh and blood. And, in good truth, if you had seen how very handsome and delicate were the understandings fashioned by the skilful artificer, you would have been puzzled to settle the question yourself, the more especially if in your real toes you were ever tormented with gout or corns. One morning, just as Master Turningvort was giving the last polish to a calf and ancle, a messenger entered his studio, to speak classically, and requested that he would immediately accompany him to the mansion of Mynheer von Wodenblock. It was the mansion of the richest merchant of Rotterdam: so the artist put on his best wig, and set forth with his three-cornered hat in one hand, and his silver-headed stick in the other. It so happened, that Mynheer von Wodenblock had been very laudably employed, a few days before, in turning a poor relation out of doors; but, in endeavouring to hasten the odious wretch's progress down stairs by a slight impulse à posteriori (for Mynheer seldom stood upon ceremony with poor relations), he had, unfortunately, lost his balance, and tumbling headlong from the top to the bottom, he found, on recoleg, and that he had lost three teeth. He at first thought of having his poor relation tried for murder; but being naturally of a merciful disposition, he only sent him to jail on account of some unpaid debt, leaving him there to enjoy or some unpaid dest, leaving nim there to enjoy the comfortable reflection, that his wife and children were starving at home. A dentist soon supplied the invalid with three teeth, which he had pulled out of an indigent poet's head at the rate of ten stivers a-piece, but for which he prudently charged the rich merchant one hundred dollars. The doctor, upon examining his leg, and recollecting that he was at that moment rather in want of a subject, cut it carefully off, and took it away with him, in his carriage, to lecture upon it to his pupils. So Mynheer Wodenblock, considering that he had been hitherto accustomed to walk, and not to hop, and being, perhaps, somewhat prejudiced in favour of the former mode of locomotion. sent for our friend at the canal basin, in order that he might give him directions about the representative with which he wished to be supplied for his lost member. The artificer entered the wealthy burgher's apartment. He was reclining on a couch, with his left leg looking as respectable as ever, but with his unhappy right stump wrapped up in bandages, as if conscious and ashamed of its own littleness. 'Turningvort, you have heard of my misfortune: it has thrown me into a fever, and all Rotterdam into confusion: but let that pass. You must make me a leg; and it must be the best leg, sir, you ever made in your life.'
Turningvort bowed. 'I do not care what it costs;' Turningvort bowed still lower; 'provided it outdoes every thing you have yet made.

I am for none of your wooden spindleshanks.

Make it of cork; let it be light and elastic, and cram it as full of springs as a watch. I know nothing of the business, and cannot be more specific in my directions; but this I am determined upon, that I shall have a leg as good as the one I have lost. I know such a thing is to be had, and if I get it from you, your reward is a thousand guiness.' The Dutch Prometheus declared, that, to please Mynheer von Wodenblock, he would do more than human ingenuity had ever done before; and undertook to bring him, within six days, a leg which would laugh to scorn the mere common legs possessed by common men. This assurance was not meant as an idle boast. Turningvort was a man of speculative, as well as practical science; there was a favourite discovery which he had long been aiming at, and he believed he had at last succeeded in accomplishing it that very morning. Like all other manufacturers of terrestrial legs, he had ever found the chief difficulty in his progress towards perfection, to consist in its being apparently impossible to introduce into them any thing in the shape of joints, capable of being regulated by the will, and of performing those important functions achieved under the present system, by means of the admirable mechanism of the knee and ancle. Our philosopher had spent years in endeavouring to obviate this grand inconvenience; and though he had, undoubtedly, made greater progress than any one else, it was not till now that he thought himself completely master of the great secret. His first attempt to carry it into execution was to be in the leg he was about to make for Mynheer von Wodenblock. It was on the evening of the sixth day from that to which I have already alluded, that with this magic leg, carefully packed up, the acute artisan again made his appearance before the expecting and im-patient Wodenblock. There was a proud vering his senses, that he had broken his right | twinkle in Turningvort's gray eye, which | tion of his leg seemed to possess, would speedily leg, and that he had lost three teeth. He at seemed to indicate that he valued even the exhaust themselves. Of this, however, he could thousand guineas, which he intended for Blanche's marriage-portion, less than the celebrity, the glory, the immortality of which he was at length so sure. He untied his precious bundle, and spent some hours in displaying and explaining to the delighted burgher the number of additions he had made to the internal machinery, and the purpose which each was in-tended to serve. The evening were away in these discussions concerning wheels within wheels, and springs acting upon springs. When it was time to retire to rest, both were equally satisfied with the perfection of the work : and at his employer's earnest request the artist consented to remain where he was for the night, in order that early next morning he might fit on the limb, and see how it performed its duty. Early next morning all the necessary arrangements were completed, and Mynheer Von Wodenblock walked forth to the street in ecstacy, blessing the inventive powers of one who was able to make so excellent a hand of his leg. It seemed, indeed, to act to admiration; in the merchant's mode of walking, there was no stiffness, no effort, no constraint. All the joints performed their office without the aid of either bone or muscle. Nobody, not even a connois-seur in lameness, would have suspected that there was any thing uncommon, any great collection of accurately adjusted clock-work under the full well-slashed pantaloons of the substantial-looking Dutchman. Had it not been for a slight tremulous motion, occasioned by the rapid whirling of about twenty small wheels in the interior, and a constant clicking like that of a watch, though somewhat louder, he would even himself have forgotten that he was not, in all respects, as he used to be, before he lifted his right foot to bestow a parting benediction on his poor relation. He walked along in the renovated buoyancy of his spirits till he came in site of the Stadt House; and just at the foot of the flight of steps that lead up to the principal door, he saw his old friend Mynheer Vanoutern waiting to receive him. He quickened his pace; and both mutually held out their hands to each other by way of congratulation, before they were near enough to be clasped in a friendly embrace. At last the merchant reached the spot where Vanoutern stood; but what was that worthy man's astonishment to see him. though he still held out his hand, pass quickly by, without stopping, even for a moment, to say 'How d'ye do?' But this seeming want of politeness arose from no fault of our hero's. His own astonishment was a thousand times greater, when he found that he had no power whatever to determine either when, where, or how his leg was to move. As long as his own wishes happened to coincide with the manner in which the machinery seemed destined to operate, all had gone on smoothly; and he had mistaken his tacit compliance with its independent and self-acting powers for a command over it which he now found he did not possess. It had been his most anxious desire to stop to speak with Mynheer Vanoutern, but his leg moved on, and he found himself under the necessity of following it. Many an attempt did he make to slacken his pace, but every attempt was vain. He caught hold of the rails, walls, and houses, but his leg tugged so violently, that he was afraid of dislocating his arms, and was obliged to go on. He began to get seriously uneasy as to the consequences of this most unexpected turn which matters had taken; and his only hope was, that the amazing and un-known powers, which the complicated construc-known powers, which the complicated construc-

as vet discover no symptoms. He happened to be going in the direction of the Levden Canal; and when he arrived in sight of Mynheer Turns ingvort's house, he called loudly upon the artificer to come to his assistance. The artificer looked out from his window with a face of wonder. 'Villain!' cried Wodenblock, 'come out to me this instant! You have made me a leg with a vengeance! It won't stand still for a moment. I have been walking straight forward ever since I left my own house, and, unless you stop me vourself, heaven only knows how much further I may walk. Don't stand gaping there, but come out and relieve me, or I shall be out of sight, and you will not be able to overtake me.' The mechanician grew very pale; he was evidently not prepared for this new difficulty. He lost not a moment, however, in following the merchant to do what he could towards extricating him from so awkward a predicament. The merchant, or rather the merchant's leg, was walking very quick, and Turningvort, being an elderly man, found it no easy matter to make up to him. He did so at last, nevertheless, and, catching him in his arms, lifted him entirely from the ground. But the stratagem (if so it may be called) did not succeed. for the innate propelling motion of the leg was so great that it hurried the artist on along with his burden at the same rate as before. He set him therefore down again, and stooping, pressed violently on one of the springs that protruded a little behind. In an instant the unhappy Mynheer Von Wodenblock was off like an arrow. calling out in the most piteous accents - ' I am lost! I am lost! I am possessed by a devil in the shape of a cork leg! Stop me! for hea-ven's sake, stop me! I am breathless,— I am ven's sake, stop me: I am breatmess,— I am fainting! Will nobody shatter my leg to pieces? Turningvort! Turningvort! you have murdered me!' The artist, perplexed and confounded, was hardly in a situation more to be envied. Scarcely knowing what he did, he fell upon his knees, clasped his hands, and with strained and staring eye-balls, looked after the richest merchant in Rotterdam, running with the speed of an enraged buffalo, away along the canal towards Leyden, and bellowing for help as loudly as his exhaustion would permit. Leyden is more than twenty miles from Rotterdam, but the sun had not yet set, when the Misses Backsneider, who were sitting at their parlour window, immediately opposite the 'Golden Lion,' drinking tea, and nodding to their friends as they passed, saw some one coming at a furious speed along the street. His face was pale as ashes, and he gasped fearfully for breath : but. without turning either to the right or the left, he hurried by at the same rapid rate, and was out of sight almost before they had time to exclaim, 'Good gracious! was not that Mynheer Von Wodenblock, the rich merchant of Rotterdam?' Next day was Sunday. The inhabitants of Haarlem were all going to church, in their best attire, to say their prayers and hear their organ, when a figure rushed across the market-place, like an animated corpse,— white, blue, cold, and speechless, its eyes fixed, its lips livid, its teeth set, and its hands clenched. Every one cleared a way for it in silent horror; and there was not a person in Haarlem who did not believe it a dead body endowed with the power of motion. On it went through village and town, towards the great wilds and forests of Germany. Weeks, months, years, elapsed, but at intervals the horrid shape was seen, and he who was once Mynheer Von Wodenblock permanent benefit to the colonies, and incline us, used to wear, have all mouldered away; the from his own shewing, to come to an opposite flesh, too, has fallen from his bones, and he is conclusion. The clearing of a country for the now a skeleton,—a skeleton in all but the cork purposes of agriculture is in no way assisted, leg, which still, in its original rotundity and but rather kept back, by the operations of a size, continues attached to the spectral form, a timber-trade. The best lands are almost invaperpetuum mobile, dragging the wearied bones riably occupied by what is termed hard wood, for ever and for ever over the earth! May all which is of no other utility but to be cut down good saints protect us from broken legs! and and cast into the fire; while the pine is the may there never again appear a mechanician like occupant of poor soils, where it would remain for Turningvort, to supply us with cork substitutes ages if not required for the purposes of building of so awful and mysterious a power!"

We close the book with cordial good wishes to its author; and we doubt not, into whatever channel he may turn his talents, they will M'Gregor's valuable opinion whether agriculmake their own way and their own success.

British America. By John M'Gregor, Esq. 2 vols. 8vo. Edinburgh, 1832, Blackwood; London, Cadell.

HAVING been so lately occupied on works similar in subject to the one before us, we shall not burden our columns with any further prefatory observations, but proceed at once to the discussion of its merits. To those who are interested in the British North American colonies, or the great questions of political economy depending from them, we strongly recommend these volumes. In the historical and descriptive parts they are at least on a par with any thing that has been already published; while with regard to commercial information, in all its widely extensive branches, they are vastly superior. Mr. M'Gregor has, in our opiuion, been most wisely diffuse on Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, and Cape Breton, the most neglected portions of our dependencies in North America; his valuable demonstrations of their resources and capabilities are well worthy of the attention of those who have the subject of emigration before them: the lessening of distance and expenditure in the passage, the easy means of support from the fisheries, and the aid which might be given to those decaying elements of our naval greatness by the location of numerous settlers in these quarters, press themselves upon the mind with no little weight. The ignorance of our men in power as to the value of these possessions has already cost us dear: * the disgraceful cession of our fishing rights to the French and Americans has led to their supplanting us on our own territories: the bank-fishery, as regards English vessels is almost entirely broken up, scarcely a dozen now frequenting there, and those inconsiderable both as to size and equipment.

The portion of the work which has the least pleased us, is where Mr. M'Gregor quits the sober path of relation to sneer at those whom he characterises as "obtuse politicians, who have adopted the impracticable doctrines of modern theorists." Now, had this been supported by argument or reasoning, we should have passed it over without recording it, as one of the many unfortunate instances where authors strike a deadly blow at their own fair fame by obtruding themselves forward as champions upon debatable ground. While upon this subject, we may add, that nothing can be so inconclusive as the writer's inferences from what he describes to be the state of the timber-trade: the adventuring, dishonesty, fluctuation, and demoralising habits which appear natural to it. afford, in our view of the case, but little hope of or transport. In the account of New Brunswick we regret the omission of the particulars of the gypsum trade, and should like to have had Mr. tural pursuits are not languishing there from its too ardent prosecution. There are many topics which a perusal of these volumes fastens on us. but which the bounds of this Journal forbid us to discuss; and we are therefore constrained to take our leave of this clever digest of colonial history with the hope that its wide circulation may lead to a more correct appreciation of the value and resources of British North America.

In supplying our readers with an extract, we by no means intend to stake the credit of the work on our selection; the most valuable parts hearing upon political economy, it would be impossible to transfer them with any effect. The following account of the last traces of the aborigines of Newfoundland is of painful interest, and will be perused with mingled sentiments of pity and indignation.

"Until the beginning of the present century there appears to have been no farther intercourse with the Boeothics; but that they continued to be hunted and shot like foxes, by the northern furriers and fishermen, is well known,-the only reason for such unjustifiable barbarity being, that the Boeothics came from their lurking-places, and robbed the fishingnets. We need not, therefore, be surprised at the unbending spirit of the Bœothics; and as to their plundering the fishing-nets, they were undoubtedly compelled by hunger to do so, at the risk of being shot. Captain Duff, Montague, and other governors, issued proclamations. which were intended to protect the Boothics; but little attention seems to have been paid by the settlers in the northern harbours, or by the furriers, to any legal authority, and the destruction of the Red Indians appeared to afford them as much sport as hunting beavers. In 1803, a female Red Indian, in consequence of a reward offered by the governor, Admiral Lord Gambier, was taken by a fisherman, who surprised her while paddling her canoe towards a small island in quest of birds' eggs. He carried her to St. John's, where she was taken to the governor's and kindly treated. She admired the epaulets of the officers more than any thing she saw; and although presents, and indeed whatever she asked for, were given her, she would never let her fur dress go out of her hands. She was afterwards sent back by the man who took her; but it is not known what became of her. It is not likely she ever joined her tribe. It was hoped that the treatment she experienced would have induced some of her tribe to open an intercourse with the English; but this was doubtful, as they might have looked upon it as a plan to ensnare them. In 1809, government sent a vessel to Exploits Bay, in order, if possible, to meet the Indians, and to open a friendly communication with them. Lieutenant Spratt, who commanded the vessel, had with him a painting, representing the officers goods at his feet, Indians, men and women, presenting furs to the officers, a European and Indian mother looking at their respective children of the same age, and a sailor courting an Indian girl. This expedition did not, however, meet with any of the tribe. In 1815-16, Lieutenant Buchan, in his majesty's schooner, was despatched to the river Exploits, with orders to winter there, and, if possible, to open an intercourse with the Bosothics. He had the fortune to meet them, and finally succeeded in communicating with them. He left two of his marines with them as hostages for the safe return of two of the tribe, whom he induced to accompany him to a depôt of baggage, among which were presents for the Indians. Something prevented the return of Lieutenant Buchan at the appointed time; and the Boothics. considering the delay as treachery on the part of the whites, tore the heads of the marines from their bodies. On Lieutenant Buchan returning, the hostages took to the woods, and he soon after found the bodies of the unlucky marines, the Indians having run off with the heads. This was a most unfortunate affair; and it is much to be lamented that Lieutenant Buchan, under any circumstances, did not return in due time. Nothing further was known of this extraordinary tribe, until the winter of 1819, when a party of furriers proceeded up to the Red Indian Lake, where they met two men and a woman on the ice. They made a prisoner of the woman; but her husband, who became desperate, and determined to rescue her single-handed, was most unjustly and cruelly shot by the brutal party, who also shot the other man. They carried off the woman, whom they called Mary March, being the name of the month in which they made her a captive. Her husband, whom they murdered, was a most noble-looking man, about six feet high. This woman was carried to St. John's, and in the following winter was sent back to the river Exploits, in charge of Captain Buchan. She died on board his vessel, at the mouth of the river; but he carried her body up to the lake, where he left it in a coffin, in a place where he knew her tribe would likely find it. It appears that a party of them was encamped at this time near the banks of the river, who observed Captain Buchan on the ice, and afterwards carried away the body of Mary March, which they deposited alongside of that of her husband. The last time any of the Boothics were seen, was during the winter of 1823, on the ice, at New Bay, an arm of Notre Dame Bay. Three of the women gave themselves up, in a starving condition, to a party of furriers; one of them, Shanandithit, was afterwards brought to St. John's, through the humanity of the members of the Beeothic Institution. A few days before these women sur-rendered themselves, and not far distant, two English furriers shot a man and woman of the tribe, who appeared to approach soliciting food. The man was first killed; and the woman, in despair, remained calmly to be fired at, when she was also shot through the back and chest. and immediately expired. Mr. Cormack was told this by the very white barbarian who shot her. Such was the fate of this tribe; and to the enterprise and philanthropy of Mr. Cormack, we owe all that remains to be told of them. That gentleman kindly furnished me with a brief narrative of his last expedition, as contained in the statement laid by him, on his return to St. John's, before the Boothic Institution. It is so very interesting, and, at the of the royal navy shaking hands with an In- same time, so sufficiently brief, as to justify dian chief, a party of sailors laying parcels of my transcribing it in full. Having (says he) so recently returned, I will now only lay are the remains of a number of summer wig- covered with snow. They had reached it from before you a brief outline of my expedition warns. Every winter wigwam has close by it in search of the Beethics, or Red Indians, a small square mouthed or oblong pit, dug into confining my remarks exclusively to its primary object. My party consisted of three Indians, whom I procured from among the other tribes: the first an intelligent and able man of the Abenakee tribe, from Canada; an elderly mountaineer from Labrador; and an adventurous young Micmac, a native of the island; together with myself. It was difficult to obtain men fit for the purpose; and the trouble attendant on this prevented my entering on the expedition a month earlier in the season. It was my intention to have commenced our search at White Bay, which is nearer the northern extremity of the island than where we did; but the weather not permitting to carry my party thither by water, after several days' delay I unwillingly changed my line of route. On the 31st October, 1827, we entered the country at the mouth of the river Exploits, on the north side, at the branch called the Northern Arm: we took a northwesterly direction, which led us to Hall's Bay, through an almost uninterrupted forest, and over a hilly country, in eight days. This tract includes the interior country, extending from New Bay, Badger Bay, Seal Bay, &c. being minor bays branching from Notre Dame Bay, and well known to have been heretofore always the summer residences of the Red Indians. On the fourth day after our departure, at the east end of Badger Bay, Great Lake, at a portage known by the name of the Indian Path, we found traces made by the Red Indians, evidently in the spring or summer of the preceding year. Their party had had two canoes; and here was a canoe-rest, on which the daubs of red ochre, and the roots of trees, used to fasten or tie it together, appeared fresh. A canoe-rest is simply a few beams, supported horizontally, about five feet from the ground. by perpendicular posts. A party with two canoes, when descending from the interior to the sea-coast, through such a part of the country as this, where there are troublesome portages leave one canoe resting, bottom up, on this kind of frame, to protect it from injury by the weather, until their return. Among other things which lay strewed about here, were a spear-shaft, eight feet in length, recently made and ochred, parts of old canoes, fragments of their skin dresses, &c. For some distance around, the trunks of many of the birch, and of that species of spruce-pine called here the var (pinus balsamifera), had been rinded; these people using the inner part of the bark of that kind of tree for food. Some of the cuts in the trees with the axe were evidently made the preceding year. Besides these, we were elated by other encouraging signs. The traces left by the Red Indians are so peculiar, that we were confident those we saw here were made by them. This spot has been a favourite place of settlement with these people. It is situated at the commencement of a portage, which forms a communication by a path between the sea-coast at Badger Bay, about eight miles to the north-east, and a chain of lakes extending westerly and southerly from hence, and discharging their surplus waters into the river Exploits, about thirty miles from its mouth. A path also leads from this place to the lakes near New Bay, to the eastward. Here are the remains of one of their villages, where the vestiges of eight or ten winter mamateeks or wigwams, each intended to contain the earth, about four feet deep, in which to preserve their stores, &c. Some of these pits were lined with birch-rind. We discovered also in this village the remains of a vapourbath. The method used by the Bosothics to raise the steam, was by pouring water on large stones made very hot for the purpose, in the open air, by burning a quantity of wood around them; after this process the ashes were removed, and a hemispherical framework, closely covered with skins to exclude the external air. was fixed over these stones. The patient then crept in under the skins, taking with him a birch-rind bucket of water, and a small bark dish with which to pour it on the stones, and to enable him to raise the steam at pleasure. At Hall's Bay, we got no useful information from the three (and the only) English families settled there; indeed, we could hardly have expected any; for these, and such people, have been the unchecked and ruthless destroyers of the tribe, the remnant of which we were in search of. After sleeping one night in a house, we again struck into the country to the westward. In five days we were in the high lands south of White Bay, and in sight of the high lands east of the Bay of Islands, on the west coast of Newfoundland. The country south and west of us was low and flat, consisting of marshes extending southerly more than thirty miles. In this direction lies the famous Red Indian Lake. It was now near the middle of November, and the winter had commenced pretty severely in the interior. The country was every where covered with snow, and for some days past we had walked over the small ponds on the ice. The summits of the hills on which we stood had snow on them, in some places many feet deep. The deer were migrating from the rugged and dreary mountains in the north, to the low and mossy ravines and more woody parts in the south; and we inferred, that if any of the Red Indians had been at White Bay during the past summer, they might at that time be stationed about the borders of the low tract of country before us, at the deerpasses, or employed somewhere else in the in-terior, killing deer for winter provisions. At these passes, which are particular places in the migration lines of path, such as the extreme ends of, and straits in, many of the large lakes. the bottoms of valleys, between high and rugged mountains, fords in the large rivers, and the like, the Indians kill great numbers of deer, with very little trouble, during their migrations. We looked out for two days from the summits of the hills adjacent, trying to discover the smoke from the camps of the Red Indians, but in vain. These hills command a very extensive view of the country in every direction. now determined to proceed towards the Red Indian Lake, sanguine that at that known rendezvous we would find the objects of our search. Travelling over such a country, except when winter has fairly set in, is truly laborious. In about ten days we got a glimpse of this beautifully majestic and splendid sheet of water. The ravages of fire which we saw in the woods, for the last two days, indicated that man had been near. We looked down upon the lake. from the hills, at the northern extremity, with feelings of anxiety and admiration. No canoe could be discovered moving on its placid surface. We were the first Europeans who had seen it in an unfrozen state; for the three below, by way of the river Exploits, on the ice. We approached the lake with hope and caution, but found, to our mortification, that the Red Indians had deserted it for some years past. My party had been so excited, so sauguine, and so determined, to obtain an interview of some kind with these people, that on discovering, from appearances every where around us, that the Red Indians, the terror of the Europeans, as well as the other Indian inhabitants of Newfoundland, no longer existed, the spirits of one and all of us were very deeply affected. The old mountaineer was particularly overcome. There were every where indications that this had long been the central and undisturbed rendezvous of the tribe, when they had enjoyed peace and security. But these primitive people had abandoned it, after having been tormented by parties of Europeans during the last eighteen years. Fatal rencontres had, on these occasions, unfortunately taken place."

We are sorry to break off in the midst of this interesting narrative, but must postpone its conclusion till our next.

The Cabinet Cyclopædia, Vol. XXVIII. Lives of British Military Commanders, Vol. 11. By the Rev. G. R. Gleig. London, 1832. Longman and Co.

MR. GLEIG has manifestly put forth his strength in composing the sketch of Mariborough's military career; and, with all due allowances for the restraints imposed by his task, has been successful in producing a very agreeable summary of the brilliant actions of that celebrated commander. From the overwhelming mass of existing materials, great discrimination and tact must have been observed in selecting; nor do we mean to detract from this high merit, by hazarding an opinion that there is a little too exclusive resort to English authorities for facts and statements, which may elsewhere create a suspicion, that national feelings and partialities have prevailed over the writer's sense of justice. With regard to descriptions of extended military movements, without accompanying diagrams, we have long ceased to attach much value to them; even the most scientific military man, unless previously acquainted with the strategy of such operations, would be quite at a loss to arrive at any correct judgment of professional merits from the printed chaos of confusion with which such affairs are usually demonstrated. We are now speaking generally; for, to do Mr. Gleig justice, he has shewn unusual skill and precision in delineating the sites, and explaining the causes through which many still celebrated fields were lost or won, during the arduous contest against the supremacy of Louis XIV. The anatomy of Marlborough's great qualities is extremely well performed, and appears to us the most original and striking passage in the volume.
We incline to the idea that Lord Peterborough owes some portion of the romantic which yet hovers round his name, to Spanish and other chroniclers, who, by drafts upon their own fertile imaginations, have industriously filled up the void caused by the destruction of his memoirs by Auastasia Robinson, after his death.

In adverting to Peterborough's character, and in other parts of this work, Mr. Gleig lays it down as an axiom, that a man's talents as a general are usually commensurate with his abilities as a statesman. Now, we are of opinion that this proposition can only be sustained by from six to eighteen or twenty people, are dis-tinctly seen close together. Besides these, there the winter, when its waters were frozen and the sentiment a dangerous one to inculcate in a free state. How few are the names conveyed to us by history as having been equally distinguished at the council-board and in the field!

Julius Cæsar, the most finished character of antiquity: Oliver Cromwell; and perhaps Marlborough and Napoleon. The political acts of these individuals make us in nowise desirous to increase their number. Our own country, singly, stamps the idea as a paradox; for, if the civil acts of the numerous distinguished military men who are usually sent to govern our colonies be looked into for a result, what do we find? nothing but dissatisfaction, eternal differences, and a want of almost every requisite for the task : not arising from the faults of the individuals, but from the inaptitude and impatience created by military pursuits for legislative functions.

The life of General Wolfe has been frequently sketched, but never with effect; indeed, but little trouble has ever been taken to collect the scattered but copious materials for his biography. We happen to know the fact, that some of his correspondence, and upon important military subjects, was still, a few years ago, to be found among the archives at Halifax : we trust that it vet remains, and that Dr. Southey's attention may be drawn to its production in the biography of the hero, on which he is understood to be employed. Wolfe was a great letter-writer; and it would be a matter of some curiosity, to be informed whether his letters were penned with mature deliberation, or at once with facility. His despatch from the St. Lawrence, describing his persevere, is one of the best pieces of military writing extant. Mr. Gleig has fortunately been able to av before his readers some hitherto unpublished specimens of his epistolary style, which we subjoin.

"We are not going to indulge in any close or captious examination into the military character of an officer who never held a separate command but once, and then held it successfully. It may be that the eye of the unsparing critic might detect a few mistakes in the campaign of the St. Lawrence - more particularly when reviewing the series of operations which preceded the last decisive movement - but he who hopes to find, either among military commanders or civilians, so much as one individual with whose professional conduct no fault is to be found, must entertain very erroneous opi-nions of human nature, with all its excellencies and defects. Be it our part rather to say a few words touching the private bias of the soldier's mind; in which we discover a great deal calculated to excite the esteem of posterity to the full as much as its respect. We have been favoured, through the kindness of a gentleman well versed in the local history of Kent, with the perusal of many letters, addressed at various times and from divers places by Wolfe, to the members of his own family. It is impossible to speak too highly of the noble and affectionate spirit which pervades them; of the proofs which they exhibit, that an ardent and romantic desire of renown was, in the case of the writer, mixed up with the best feelings of a son, a man, and a Christian. We cannot pretend, in a sketch like this, to make numerous extracts from this collection; but the following sentences, taken at random, will perhaps tend, more than any remarks of our own, to throw light upon the private character of the conqueror of Quebec. On the 13th of August, 1749, Wolfe writes to his mother from Glas-ance on the outward forms of religion: 'I have observed your instructions so religiously, that, rather than want the Word, I got the reputation of a very good Presbyterian, by frequenting the kirk of Scotland till our chaplain appeared. To-morrow Lord George Sackville goes away. and I take upon me the difficult and troublesome office of a commander. You cannot conceive how hard a thing it is to keep the passions within bounds, when authority and immaturity go together, to endeavour at a character that has every opposition from within, and that the very condition of the blood is a sufficient obstacle to. Fancy you see me, that must do justice to both good and bad, reward and punish with an equal unbiassed hand; one that is to reconcile the severity of discipline to the dictates of humanity; one that must study the tempers and dispositions of many men, in order to make their situation easy and agreeable to them, and should endeavour to oblige all without partiality; a man set up for every body to observe and judge of; and, last of all, suppose me employed in discouraging vice and recommending the reverse, at the turbulent age of twenty-three, when it is possible I may have as great a propensity that way as any of the men I converse with. Again, in a letter addressed to the same person, which bears date Inverness, November 6, 1751, he says, 'This day I am five-and-twenty years of age.' - 'There are times when men fret at trifles, and quarrel with their tooth-picks. In one of these ill habits I exclaim against the present condition, and think it the worst of all; but, coolly and temperately, first failures, and his steadfast determination to it is plainly the best. Where there is most employment and least vice, there one should wish to be.' It is in this letter that he declares his propensity for the married state; after which he goes on to say, 'Lord Bury (the colonel of the regiment) professes fairly and means nothing: in this he resembles his father. He desires never to see the regiment, and wishes that no officer would ever leave it. This is selfish and unjust.' To his father he writes from Exeter, February 18, 1755: 'By my mother's letter I find that your bounty and liberality keep pace, as they usually do, with my necessities. I shall not abuse your kindness, nor receive it unthankfully; and what use I make of it shall be for your honour and the king's service—an employment worthy the hand that gives it.' We have given these extracts, as tending to illustrate the affectionate and kindly feeling which Wolfe cherished towards his parents, as well as the sober and just conceptions which he had formed, even in the heyday of youth, as to the duties imposed upon himself by his station. We subjoin the following, for the purpose of proving that the writer's principles were not lightly taken up, and that each successive year served only to strengthen and mature them. He writes from Southampton, 28th of September, 1755, to his mother: 'My nature requires some extraordinary events to produce itself. I want that attention and those assiduous cares that commonly go along with good nature and humanity. In the common occurrences of life, I own I am not seen to advantage. Again, from Canterbury, 8th of November, 1755, he says, 'I write by the duke's (of Cumberland) order to inquire after an officer's widow in Ireland, who, he was told, had a son fit to serve; and his royal highness, who is for ever doing noble and generous actions, wanted to provide for that child. The father was killed at Fontenoy.'- 'If I book. don't keep a good watch over myself, I must gow, partly in general terms, and partly in be a little vain, for the duke has of late given reply to a letter of advice respecting his attend. me such particular marks of his esteem and confidence, that I am ashamed not to deserve it better.' This expression is in strict agreement with a remark which he makes elsewhere in his correspondence: 'Such has been the marked and unmerited notice taken of me by the leading military characters of the day, that I feel myself called upon to justify such notice, which when occasion occurs, will probably be by such exertions and exposures of myself as will lead to my fall.' Such are but a few out of the numerous specimens which lie before us of the style which characterised the correspondence of this distinguished man; and though we may lament that the plan of our work will not permit the insertion of more, we feel that even they suffice to convey a correct picture of a mind, not more aspiring than gentle, nor more brilliant than modest. Wolfe owed little to nature, as far as the form of his features was concerned, though the general expression of his countenance was good. His hair was red, and he persisted, contrary to the fashion of the times, in wearing it undisguised even by povder; but his blue eye was full of meaning, and his smile peculiarly attractive. His constitution, which from his cradle was delicate, began in latter years wholly to fail him. To the stone he had become a complete martyr; and there were the seeds of other diseases sown, some a which must have doubtless cut short the thread of life, had the bullet of the enemy spared it Under these circumstances, who can regret that he should have fallen as he did on the battlefield, more especially as there is evidence on record that he began to entertain something like disgust to the service? Of his attachment to Miss Lowther we have already spoken; and to it, perhaps, may be attributed the plan which he seems to have formed, of retiring from active employment so soon as the American expedition should be terminated. But, however this may he, it is impossible not to rejoice that Providence saw fit otherwise to dispose of him. At a domestic man, his fame, no matter how justly earned, would have year by year lost its lustre; by closing his earthly career in the moment of a great and shining victory, he cast a halo round his name, such as time will never be able to diminish. The body of Wolfe, pre-served in spirits, was conveyed in a ship of war to Portsmouth, where it was carried on shore amid all the honours which usually attend the debarkation of highly-valued clay. Minuteguns sent their echoes over the water : the flags floated half-mast high; and a military escort, with arms reversed, received it on the beach, and followed the hearse, which stood ready to carry it elsewhere, beyond the precincts of the fortification. But the respect shewn to Wolfe, or rather to services which Wolfe had performed, ended not here. All classes of persons, high and low, rich and poor, mourned for him; while parliament voted that a monument should be raised to his memory in Westminster Abbey. Yet his ashes rest not under the shade of that gorgeous pile. His mother, by this time the sole surviving member of the family, claimed the melancholy satisfaction of committing them to the dust; and they were laid beside those of his father, in a vault in the parish church of Greenwich."

We are sorry our limits prevent us from quoting the analysis of the character of Marlborough-one of the best specimens both of Mr. Gleig's eminent talent and excellent style: our readers will be amply gratified by it in the

Gleanings of Natural History. By E. Jesse, Esq. London, 1832. Murray. (Unpublished.)

WHEN we consider what a wide field of delight is opened by the study of natural history, what an interest it gives to the occasional visitor, and what an attractive pursuit it is to the constant resident, we hazard little in predicting that the volume now before us will be a favourite with a large class of readers. It is written by a true lover of nature, and one who most pleasantly records his actual observations. We shall endeavour to make a collection, as miscellaneous as the pages from which it is selected.

Utility of the long claws of the lark .- " The lark makes its nest generally in grass fields, where it is liable to be injured either by cattle grazing over it, or by the mower. In case of alarm from either these or other causes, the parent birds remove their eggs, by means of their long claws, to a place of greater security; and this transportation I have observed to be effected in a very short space of time. By placing a lark's egg, which is rather large in proportion to the size of the bird, in the foot, and then drawing the claws over it, you will perceive that they are of sufficient length to secure the egg firmly; and by this means the bird is enabled to convey its eggs to another place, where she can sit upon and hatch them.

Sagacity of an elephant. - "I was one day feeding the poor elephant (who was so barba-rously put to death at Exeter 'Change) with potatoes, which he took out of my hand. One of them, a round one, fell on the floor, just out of the reach of his proboscis. He leaned against his wooden bar, put out his trunk, and could just touch the potato, but could not pick it up. After several ineffectual efforts, he at last blow the potato against the opposite wall, with sufficient force to make it rebound; and he then, without difficulty, secured it.

Ingenuity of bees .- "A large brown slug made its way into a glass hive, where the operations of the bees could be distinctly seen. Having killed the slug, and finding that they were unable to get it out of the hive, they covered it over with the thick resinous substance called propolis, and thus prevented its becoming a nuisance to the colony. Into the same hive one of the common brown-shelled snails also gained admittance. Instead of embedding it in propolis, the bees contented themselves with fixing it to the bottom of the hive, by plaster-ing the edge with that substance. I have now in my possession a regular fortification made of propolis, which one of my stocks of bees placed at the entrance of their hive, to enable them the better to protect themselves from the attacks of wasps. By means of this fortification, a few bees could effectually guard the entrance, by lessening the space of admission, which I had neglected to do for them."

Proper pride in a dog ._ "A gentleman, a good shot, lent a favourite old pointer to a friend, who had not much to accuse himself of in the slaughter of partridges, however much he might have frightened them. After ineffectually firing at some birds which the old pointer had found for him, the dog turned away in apparent disgust, went home, and never could be persuaded to accompany the same person afterwards."

Snail-shells.—" Having frequently observed some broken snail-shells near two projecting pebbles on a gravel walk, which had a hollow between them, I endeavoured to discover the occasion of their being brought to that situation. At last I saw a thrush fly to the spot with a snail-shell in his mouth, which he man who was stationed on the bridge, and had bring a clear glass bottle, filled with water, placed between the two stones, and hammered them cleaned. The same circumstance having at it with his heak till he had broken it, and occurred more than once, his curiosity was exwas then able to feed on its contents. The cited, and he watched the dog. He saw him bird must have discovered that he could not apply his beak with sufficient force to break the shell while it was rolling about, and he therefore found out and made use of a spot which would keep the shell in one position. I do not know whether Mr. M'Adam has ever observed the same circumstance, but his ingenious contrivance (if it is his) of confining stones in a sort of hoop while they are being broken, is somewhat similar to that of the thrush."

The antipathy of the hen to water is well known; yet the following is a curious instance of habit overcoming nature.

"A hen, who had reared three broods of ducks in three successive years, became habituated to their taking to the water, and would fly to a large stone in the middle of the pond, and patiently and quietly watch her brood as they swam about it. The fourth year she hatched her own eggs; and finding that her chickens did not take to the water as the ducklings had done, she flew to the stone in the pond, and called them to her with the utmost eagerness. This recollection of the habits of her former charge, though it had taken place a year before, is not a little curious."

Sentimental swan.- "A pair of swans had been inseparable companions for three years, during which time they had reared three broods of cygnets. Last autumn the male was killed, and since that time the female has separated herself from all society with her own species; and though at the time I am writing (the end of March) the breeding season for wans is far advanced, she remains in the same state of seclusion, resisting the addresses of a male swan who has been making advances towards forming an acquaintance with her, either driving him away, or flying from him whenever he comes near har. How long she will continue in her present state of widowhood I know not, but at present it is quite evident that she has not forgotten her former partner."

Ditto pigeon..... A man, set to watch s field of peas which had been much preyed upon by pigeons, shot an old cock pigeon who had long been an inhabitant of the farm. His mate, around whom he had for many a year cooed, and nourished from his own crop, and assisted in rearing numerous young ones, immediately settled on the ground by his side, and shewed her grief in the most expressive manner. The labourer took up the dead bird and tied it to a short stake, thinking that it would frighten away the other depredators. In this situation, however, his partner did not forsake him, but continued, day after day, walking slowly round the stick. The kind-hearted wife of the bailiff of the farm at last heard of the circumstance, and immediately went to afford what relief she could to the poor bird. She told me that, on arriving at the spot, she found the hen bird much exhausted, and that she had made a circular beaten track round the dead pigeon, making now and then a little spring towards him. On the removal of the dead bird, the hen returned to the dove-cot.'

Instances of sagacity in dogs .- " He informed me that a friend of his, an officer in the forty-fourth regiment, who had occasion, when in Paris, to pass one of the bridges across the Seine, had his boots, which had been previously well-polished, dirted by a poodle-dog rubbing against them. He in consequence went to a cited, and he watched the dog. He saw him roll himself in the mud of the river, and then watch for a person with well-polished boots, against which he contrived to rub himself. Finding that the shoe-black was the owner of the dog, he taxed him with the artifice; and after a little hesitation he confessed that he had taught the dog the trick in order to procure customers for himself. The officer being much struck with the dog's sogneity, purchased him at a high price, and brought him to England. He kept him tied up in London some time, and then released him. The dog remained with him a day or two, and then made his escape. A fortnight afterwards he was found with his former master, pursuing his old trade on the bridge.

"A friend of mine had a poodle-dog possessed of more than ordinary sagacity, but he was, however, under little command. In order to keep him in better order, my friend purchased a small whip, with which he corrected the dog once or twice during a walk. On his return the whip was put on a table in the hall, and the next morning it was missing. It was soon afterwards found concealed in an outbuilding, and again made use of in correcting the dog. It was, however, again lost, but found hidden in another place. On watching the dog, who was suspected of being the culprit, he was seen to take the whip from the halltable, and run away with it, in order again to hide it. The late James Cumming, Esq., was the owner of the dog, and related this anecdote to me."

Cockney beehive. - " I hear of a hive of bees on the top of a house in the middle of Holborn, which is doing very well. The circumstance of bees finding their way home through the thick smoke, fogs, and vapours of the metropolis, seems to prove that their course is not directed by sight, but by some still unexplained instinct."

We would point the attention of the naturalist to an ingenious speculation on the migration of fish; and, indeed, the whole of the fishing pages are so agreeable, that we think we shall be tempted to throw our line into them next Saturday.

By William Martin. With original Poetical Illustrations. 18mo. pp. 504. London, 1832. Hamilton and Co.

A GREAT deal of information is contained in this volume, whose motto might be Thomson's well-known lines...

In such a spirit is the view taken of Nature's wonders in these pages. We particularly recommend them to our youthful readers: the animation of the writer's feelings communicates itself to his style; and much knowledge is put into a clear and popular form. What an instance of the truth of the old adage, that " necessity is the mother of invention," is contained in the following brief extract from the chapter on optics !-- "The poor lace-makers of Buckinghamshire, on coming to their work, each which is fixed into a rest round a single candle, palm or paint the particulars. We would ask, which makes the light sufficient for the whole if " to dismantle" (page 48) be a proper phrase party, by obstructing it from its natural course to apply to a forest? Mémoires de Madame la Duchesse St. Leu, ex-Reine de Holland; suivis des Romances composées et mises en Musique par elle-même, et ornés d'un Portrait et de douse Gravures. Londres, 1832. Colburn et Bentley.

A VERY pretty volume-just one of those ladylike tomes made for the drawing-room and the boudoir. The memoir is a pleasant record of its fair subject, but contains nothing of novelty to provoke extract. The airs are generally very sweet, and one or two likely to be as popular as our old favourite, " Partant pour la Syrie."

The frontispiece represents Hortense, the blue-eyed blonde of her family, playing on a lyre; and the volume is in the form of a quarto music-book. The engravings are from paintings by the duchess, to illustrate the subjects of her romances; such as Le Beau Dunois, Héloise an Paraclet, and other more modern topics. The whole may be regarded as a literary curiosity well adapted for the fashionable world.

Maxims and Morals for every Day in the Year. selected from the most approved Authors. By C. W. 32mo. pp. 156. London, 1832, Baldwin and Cradock; Alexander, York; Wooll, Hastings.

A very little volume, but upon a plan which might be advantageously enlarged, or perhaps more advantageously improved upon, - if we suppose that either an instructor or a pupil should be required to note one (only one) reflection daily. These might at first be common-place; but if the mind were worth cultivating, they would soon become original and strong. If it were not for the toil of the Gazette, we would try the experiment; but, as we have not time, we give an example or two of C. W.

Ir brevity be the soul of knowledge, as well as of wit, the present attempt to compress the multitudinous topics of the year within a small compass, must deserve much popularity. The design, indeed, seems to accommodate itself to the reigning public taste, which is to have every thing in little-a natural consequence of having more things to learn than human capacity can embrace in a better and more extended sense. It is the multitude of matters which, in every branch of science and intelligence, doth make smatterers of us all, and leaves profoundness to some one in ten thousand, entirely devoted to a particular study. This Cabinet Register is very fairly compiled and arranged.

ARTS AND SCIENCES. ROYAL INSTITUTION.

THE lecture on improvisation, delivered at the Royal Institution last week by the Marquess Moscati, created so strong a sensation, that we were anxious to procure a more extended report of it than we could obtain previously to our appearance on Saturday. But as our friend, the learned and accomplished lecturer, delivered his discourse without notes, we are sorry to say we can afford but a meagre account of what made so powerful an impression upon an auditory of some seven hundred persons, including about two hundred ladies. Well aware of the extraordinary gifts and talents of the marquess, we can only hope that our disappointment in this from Latin passages, physiological observations, instance may be, to a certain degree, compensated by his being induced to continue his brilliant labours in the same theatre of high literary and intellectual resort. The following notes were taken by an able anditor:

After having given a philosophical definition of poetry, the lecturer declared that extemporaneous poetry is nothing but a divine mania, arising from irritation of the nervous system, and from over-excitement of the brain. He then introduced a great variety of the most renowned improvisatori of all ages, and of many different nations. The Hebrews were first mentioned, and David and Judith were described as truly inspired poets; and specimens of their extemporaneous poems were quoted in the Hebrew language. Next came the Phœnicians; and Marbat was cited as their best improvisatore. The Carthaginian improvisatori were afterwards commented upon. With Virgil neous poetry at the banquet which Dido gave to Æneas. Hannibal also had with him at Cyma an improvisatore, called Hamicar, who died in that city. The renowned Carthaginian traveller, Hanno, was accompanied into the in-terior of Africa by Satubal, who was accutomed to sing extemporaneous poems for the amusement of the company. The Egyptian were also endowed with the gift of improvisation; and the lecturer pointed out Berytas, the poet of Cleopatra. Several Greek improvisatori were also introduced; and after having spoken of Homer, Orpheus, Corinna, Sappho, and Musæus, the marquess, by quotations from Strabo, proved that there existed a Thyrsian academy, where only improvisatori were admitted. Several Arcadians, and especially Thyrsis and Corydon, were much commended. From Greece he passed to Rome, and with Dionysius of Halicarnassus quoted an extenporaneous poet who lived under Romulus. He then alluded to Archias, who has been celebrated by Cicero. Quintus Rennius Fannius was also cited as a renowned Roman improvisatore, and the testimony of Suetonius was produced: lastly, a young Roman was mentioned, as having been publicly crowned under Trajan, for his extraordinary genius in extempora-neous poetry. From the Germans he selected the Minnesingers and Leibesingers, as their best improvisatori. The Provençal Troubsdours, the French Trouverers, and the Spanish improvisatori, were also described. The lecturer did not shew great admiration for French He introduced Lord Byron, as an English improvisatore; and cited some lines from an extemporaneous poem, which the English bard composed in the Campo-Santo of Pisa, in his presence. In speaking of Italy, he seemed animated with feelings of grief, and divided the improvisatori of his unhappy country into two classes, the educated and the uneducated. Of the latter he mentioned three, of whom he gave several specimens; and in analysing a stanza of a Neapolitan lazzarone, he caused general merriment, and was universally applauded. The lecturer then widely described the most celebrated educated improvisatori: these were, Serafino dell' Aquila, Bernardino Accolti, Brandolino, Giammaria Filelfo, Niccola Leoniceno, Andrea Marone, Bernardino Perfetti, Corilla Olympica, Meta-tasio, Don Caspare Mollo, Duke of Lusci-ano, Gianni, Sgricci, and Taddei. He stated that Madame de Staël had taken the principal characters of her Corinne from Corilla; and that the Oswald of Corinne was the late Duke of Gloucester. He went on to demonstrate, and historical facts, that the improvisatori when singing are under the powerful influence of a spiritual mania. Having, lastly, given an explanation of the art of improvisation, he demanded rhymes for a sonnet. These were given from Petrarch; on which he first composed a sonnet on Naples, and then another on Love: both the subjects were proposed by the audience. The lecturer offered to sing an extemporaneous poem, accompanied by music, but it was in vain that he appealed to the gentlemen for the accompaniment. A kind lady, however, descended from the gallery, and having taken the tune on which he was to sing, a subject was demanded; and Music was given as the theme, and sung. We subjoin a copy of the verses.

Ode on Music. Dellé siere l'eterna armonia, Che nei giro de lor movimenti Fan con dolci graditi concenti L'alto empireo ognor risens Della Musica sveglia l' idea, E la strana concordia c' attesta, Che col basso il soprano n' innesta, E produce il soave cantar. Il volatile stuoi, che s' annida Ne' giardin, nelle selve, ne' monti, Se alla Musica ancor tu confronti Trovi esemplo di grato placer.

Filomela, che narra dolente
Con dolcissima voce il suo amore,
Ci risveglia un diletto nel core,
Che ci fa del suo canto goder.

Quando l'uomo è dal duolo depresso Quando l'uomo è dai duolo depresso Può la Musica torgil la noja,
E destargli nel seno la gioja,
Anche in mezzo al più crudo dolor.
Deh! mirate il soldato, che corre
Spensierato al periglio, alla morte,
Sol la Musica il rende più forte,
E lo sprona nel bellico ardor.

Colla Musica vince l'amante
La durezza di quella ch' adora,
Colla Musica il Nume s' onora,
Colla Musica onora il re;
Colla Musica onora il re;
Colla Musica in petto s' accende
Del pocta quel vivido ardore
Che lo fa improvisar nel furore,
E lo rende maggiore di se.

Ma la Musica invano cercai Fra la dotta gentile udienza, Ch' ascoltommi con grande pazienza, E d' applausi mi rese l' onor. Se non for non fosse per questa donzella Che degnò d' ajutarmi nel canto, Che degnò d' ajutarmi nei canuo, lo per certo perduto avrei il vanto Di spiegarvi de' vati il valor.

The next subject proposed was Poland, and the lecturer, in singing of that unfortunate country, took a very elevated tone: his words, his actions, and his voice, seemed extremely agitated. At the end, universal applause was accorded; and a venerable Polish gentleman, with his eyes in tears, twice embraced the poet before the company, and expressed his admiration. The entire scene was such as is rarely witnessed with our calm temperament, and in our phlegmatic climate.

GEOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

THE anniversary meeting of this Society was held at its apartments in Somerset House, on Friday the 17th ult. The chair was taken by the President, Mr. Murchison, at one o'clock; and the business of the day commenced by the secretaries and treasurer reading the annual reports of the council on the state of the Society, and the accounts for the past year. By these documents it appeared that the Society's numbers had been increased by thirtyfive resident and non-resident fellows, and two foreign members, Von Hoff and Eilert Mitscherlich. From the auditors' report it likewise appeared that the state of the Society was prosperous, the receipts of the year just terminated having considerably exceeded the expenses. The list of donations to the museum and library was also read, and the acquisitions to both were shewn to have been very considerable. The fellows then proceeded to ballot for the officers and council for the ensuing year; and the glasses having been duly closed and the lists examined, the scrutineers announced that the under-mentioned had been unanimously elected :-

President, Roderick Impey Murchison, Esq.
Vice-Presidente, Rev. Dr. Buckland, Rev. William Daniel Conybeare, Dr. Fitton, and Rev. Professor Sedgwick.

Secretaries, William John Hamilton, Esq. and Edward Turner, M.D.

Turner, M.D.

Foreign Secretary, Charles Lyell, Eaq.

Treasurer, John Taylor, Eaq.

Council, W.J. Broderip, Eaq., W. Clift, Eaq., Viscount

Cole, M.P., H. T. De la Beche, Eaq., Sir P. Egerton, Bart., D. Gilbert, Eaq. M.P., Rev. W. Whewell, and

Rev. James Yates.

In the evening, the fellows and their friends, to the amount of 120, dined at the Crown and Anchor, and afterwards re-assembled at their apartments in Somerset House, where the president delivered his anniversary ad-state of the science on the continent, and paid a tribute to the merits of Dr. Sommering, of Frankfort, whose decease on the foreign list was noticed; and alluded to the conchological researches of M. Des Haves; the geological chart of the island of Teneriffe, by Dr. Von Buch; to the mineralogical journal of Professor Leonhard, of Heidelberg, and especially to the important investigations which had already resulted from the appearance of a volcanic island in the Mediterranean, which Captain W. H. Smyth, Dr. Davy, M. Prévost, and still more recently Mr. Horner, in the translation which he had sent to the Society of a valuable German memoir on the subject, had so ably described; the result of which is, that this island was not the mere effect of the rising of a shoal at an inconsiderable depth, but was evidently forced up from a deep sea He informed the Society, that the council had appropriated the dividends on the Wollaston fund for the year to the service of Mr. Lonsdale, the very able curator to the Society, who had undertaken a survey during the summer of the colitic districts. He entered into an elaborate analysis of the papers read at the Society's meetings during the past session, and then proceeded to notice the published works of the fellows. He spoke in terms of the highest praise of Professor Lyell's Principles of Geology, and M. De la Bèche's Manual of Geology; the latter of which he characterised as the dynamics of geology. He passed a severe censure on the work of Dr. Macculloch, which asserted, that since the year 1821 not a single step has been made in the advancement of geology as a science,-and the president expressed his regret that an author who possessed such undoubted talents, should display so much unwillingness to admit the claims of geologists during that period; and remarked, that while to the works of De la Bèche and Lyell the geologist must refer for clear and luminous statements of the science of geology as it now is, he could only consult Dr. Macculloch's work to ascertain what it was ten years ago. He then took a passing review of the various new Societies springing up in different parts of the kingdom, and especially alluded to the Newcastle Society, and the Yorkshire Philosophical Society, whose next meeting was to be held at Oxford in June. He concluded by pointing out the unanimity and consequent strength of union which reigned throughout the Society; and after dwelling on the continued co-operation of their early president, Mr. Greenough, and of their recent one, Professor Sedgwick, he felt assured that, with such a spirit and such a co-operation, in addition to that of a Herschel, a Faraday, a Broderip, a Stokes, a Clift, and a Lindley, the Geological Society could not fail steadily to advance itself and be progressive.

In the course of the day, the gratifying intelligence was announced that Government had granted, on the application of Lord Morpeth, to Mr. Smith a pension of 100l. a-year, as a reward for his long and valuable services to geology: and the president farther announced, that the Master-general and Board of Ordnance, seeing the importance of the trigonometrical survey to geology, had liberally supplied the Society with the published sheets of the ordnance survey.

Feb. 29.-Mr. Murchison in the chair. The Earl of Kerry, and William Smith, Esq. were elected fellows.

A paper was first read on the Titterstone dress, on the progress of geology during the Clee Hill coal-field, and on the old red sand-past year. In this he took a view of the stone and transition formations to the westward stone and transition formations to the westward of it, by J. R. Wright, Esq. employed on the trigonometrical survey; and communicated by Colonel Colby. This memoir was accompanied by a portion of the ordnance map, including about 165 square miles, coloured geologically, and by illustrative sections.

A letter from Sir John Herschel to the president was then read, explanatory of a paper laid before the Society during the last session, on certain subterraneous sounds heard near Nakoos, in Arabia.

LITERARY AND LEARNED.

BOYAL SOCIETY.

Dr. MATON in the chair. The concluding part of Dr. Hall's paper was read; and at the request of the fellows, the apparatus itself, as employed by the author, was exhibited in illustration of the paper. Dr. Hall proceeds in this part of his inquiries to investigate the sensibility, muscular motility, digestion, quiescence, and torpor from cold, of hibernating animals, and deduces the following results :- He finds that the sensibility of animals in this state is unimpaired, the least touch being found sufficient to disturb their lethargy; that the period during which they can remain without food varies in different animals, the secretions impeded while in the torpid state going on rapidly when roused to take food; that extremes of heat or cold are alike unfavourable in inducing the hibernating state, a temperate heat being found the most effective; that the torpor arising from cold is totally distinct in all its circumstances from hibernation, and that the animals experience, most probably, no pain from the suspension of respiration, in consequence of the left side of the heart, by its veno-contractile power, maintaining the venous circulation, the arterial action being suspended.

Mr. Lubbock read a letter from Sir James South, inviting the attention of astronomical observers to the approaching occultations by the moon of 119 and 120 Touri, (last night).

In December last, in observing the occultations of these stars, while the former presented no unusual appearance, the latter before its disappearance exhibited the singular phenomenon of projection to the amount of forty seconds of a degree on the moon's disc. As the moon will have passed the meridian several hours and be near the horizon, Sir James South, with his great zeal for astronomy, liberally offers the use of his house and observatory at Kensington to those observers who would be prevented by the smoke of the metropolis from witnessing this phenomenon under favourable circumstances.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.

MARCH 8.—Hudson Gurney, Esq. in the chair. A communication from the chairman was read, being extracts from a manuscript in the possession of his relative, Daniel Gurney, Esq., a fellow of the Society. They consisted of entries of the municipal proceedings and arrangements of the corporation of Lynn, for a period of three centuries, between the years 1430 and 1731. It was remarked, that the collision of parties in ancient communities partook much of the military rudeness of the middle ages; and that the debates of corporations appear to have re-sembled those of the great council of the nation, where the steward, constable, and marshal, were not unfrequently required to take an active part as moderators, with all the weight of their officers and retainers.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF LITERATURE.

DURING the present session, the pious and learned President of this Society, the Bishop of Salisbury, has resigned the chair, in which he has sat since its foundation by his late Majesty. The reasons assigned were, his advanced age, and the probability of his being less in town than heretofore. The Council addressed a letter of grateful thanks to his Lordship, for his unwearied zeal and valuable services to the Institution; and the temporary presidency devolved upon his Grace the Duke of Rutland, the first upon the list of vice-presidents. Ha ving witnessed the labours of the most estimable Prelate, from the beginning to this time, we venture humbly to express our high admiration of the ability and finely-toned judgment with which he has throughout adorned his office.

February 1st .- W. Sotheby, Esq. in the chair. Mr. Hamilton read a memoir by Mr. Millingen, royal associate, on the origin of the Roman divinities. While many of the gods of ancient Rome retained their Greek names unchanged, others received appellations wholly different. This remarkable fact Mr. Millingen endeavours to reconcile with the acknowledged identity of the religious system of the Greeks and Romans. In a variety of learned remarks on the derivation of the names of the twelve principal deities of the latter people, as well as on those of many of the gods of an inferior order, he shows that they were all alike of Greek origin; thereby confirming the identity above mentioned, and, by consequence, strengthening the existing testimony in regard to the Greek origin of the Roman race. A letter was read from Mr. S. Angell, containing a description of the ruins of one of the temples at Selinus, in Sicily, in reference to a notice read at the meeting of January 4, relative to the subjects of several sculptured metopes, lately examined among those ruins, the existence of which was discovered by Mr. Angell, in the year 1823.

February 15.—W. R. Hamilton, Esq. in the chair. A memoir was read by Mr. J. P. Thomas, in which much light was thrown upon the moral and allegorical meanings of the fabulous mythology of Greece and Rome. Part of a memoir by the Rev. Dr. J. Jamieson, royal associate, was likewise read, on the earliest Scottish coins now extant. Wise, in his catalogue of the Bodleian collection, referring to those coins which by Anderson, in his Diplomata Scotia, have been assigned to Alexander and David, each the first of his name, has strongly expressed his doubts whether any of them go further back than to the age of Wil-liam the Lion, who began his reign in 1165. For, observes that writer, those commonly given to Alexander I. and David I. were probably struck by Alexander II. and David II. This opinion, which is also maintained by Snelling and De Cardonnel, is combated, and, as it appears to us successfully, by Dr. Jamieson; to the details of whose argument we shall have an opportunity of adverting in our next notice of the Society's sittings.

ROYAL ASIATIC SOCIETY.

THE Right Hon. C. W. W. Wynn in the chair. - Donations laid on the table: From Capt. Rainier, R.A. a pair of beautiful models, in black marble, of the obelisk at Heliopolis in Egypt (the On of the Scriptures), and of one of the obelisks at Zan, or Goshen. From Sir G. T. Staunton, a collection of specimens of Chinase to possess medicinal virtues: one kind is in cakes, which has a very strong and aromatic flavour of tea; the other is a large ball, not unlike a melon in shape. Sir George also presented, besides several Chinese MSS. and printed books, some fans used by the Chinese mandarins, one of which has a complete work, containing upwards of 6000 characters, printed on it; and two others have a map of the city of Pekin, for ornament. From Miss Forbes. daughter of General Forbes, an Arabic Grammar, explained in Italian, copied by herself from the papers of Signor Grassi: the work extends to 366 pages in 4to., and is exquisitely written throughout.

M. Dabadie, Astronomer at the College of Port Louis in the Mauritius, and Charles Telfair, Esq., President of the Committee of Public Instruction in that island, were elected corresponding members of the Society.

The paper read was..." Remarks on the language of the Amazirgs, improperly called Berebbers," by the Chevalier Graberg d'Hemse. The original inhabitants of Mount Atlas, and of nearly all the provinces of Moghrib el Aksu (the present empire of Morocco), are usually divided into two tribes-namely, the Berebbers and the Shelluhs; and the first part of this memoir is devoted to an inquiry as to their respective origin. The language of the Berebbers, or Amazirgs, presents, according to M. Graberg, a highly original character, coming very near to the Hebrew, and consequently to the Phoenician. The best information extant relating to it, in the author's opinion, is that published in the translation of Hornemann's Travels, which was furnished to M. Langlès by M. Ventura. M. Gräberg annexes som specimens of the language, procured by himself while at Morocco and Tripoli; and the paper is concluded by a vocabulary of the dialect as spoken at Ghádams, in the pashalic of Tripeli.

Professor A. W. von Schlegel and Count Neimcewitz were present at this meeting.

FINE ARTS.

BRITISH GALLERY. [Fifth Notice.]

No. 464. La Rosier. Madame de Comolera. Charmingly painted; but, for such a subject. a little too much subdued in tone. With all deference to the skill and talents of the fair artist, we would suggest that harmony does not arise from an undue prevalence of the same hue. We are confident that the introduction of a blue and white china jar would have set off her roses to great advantage.

No. 473. A Scene near Geneva. S.J. Stump. - A beautiful and extensive view; in colour perhaps partaking too much of what Thomson calls "the purple-streaming amethyst."

No. 477. Scene in the Dargle, Wicklow. A. O'Connor. - The very spot for those who are fond of fishing in troubled waters, or of filling their imagination with romantic horrors. We have great admiration of Mr. O'Connor's talents; but we think the deep gloom in which he delights to involve his scenes might occasionally be diminished with advantage. No. 495. Moonlight, it is quite in place, and the effect is strikingly grand and solemn. No. 479. View on the Derwent. F.W.Watts.

-Instead of calling for "a lodge in some vast wilderness," for the purpose of escaping from the turmoil of life, we would prefer to be transported to a scene like this; there, with some of Izaak Walton's dispositions and habits, to Chinese and Japanese lackered ware; also while away the fag end of our days. It is a specimens of essence of tea, considered by the sweetly painted picture.

No. 488. The Gipsies' Encampment. Kidd.—Defectively drawn; but a very clever effect of fire-light, falling upon a group com-pounded of mirth and mischief. The wily tribe have decoyed a simple sportsman into their toils: it needs no oracle to tell his fortune.

No. 482. Civita Castellana. W. Linton; No. 496. Borrodale. T. C. Hoffand. - In placing these performances much judgment has been displayed, and the characters of Italian and English scenery are brought into comparison with mutual advantage,

No. 513. Harvesting. W. F. Witherington, A.R.A.—The same justice which induced us to praise the arrangement of the last-mentioned works, compels us to censure the position of this beautiful production, of which we have on a former occasion expressed our admiration. That so fine a picture should be so placed, and that it should remain unsold, are painful facts, which shew what a lottery art is.

No. 514. The Duke of Bedford's Cottage at Endsleigh. F. C. Lewis, sen .- A beautiful specimen of English scenery.

No. 522. View on the Thames near Waterloo Bridge. C. Deane.—'The artist has been very happy in the choice of his station; the objects are varied and picturesque; and there is a cheerful effect of light and colour throughout.

No. 523. The Love-Letter. T. Webster ... "Sad waste of time and paper!" some superannuated cynic may exclaim. The artist has exhibited waste of another kind. While the delighted girl is devouring the contents of her billet-doux, the ale-barrel is running to waste. In character and expression, in colouring and chiaroscuro, there is, however, neither waste nor want in Mr. Webster's very clever performance.

No. 525. Sunset at Sea: the original design for Mary Stuart's Parswell to France. E. D. Leahy.—A sufficient time has elapsed since we saw, and expressed our admiration of, the original picture, to make Mr. Leahy's sketch for ginal picture, to make hir. Leany's should for it, full as it is of spirit, grace, and character, come upon us with all the charm of novelty. Whether the design, or the finished painting, neither the interest of the subject nor the talent of the artist loses any thing upon a second

No. 528. Playing at Cards. C. Steedman. The game is evidently brag: the expression of the heads, although vulgar (as befits the parties engaged) is admirable.

THE "Bachelor," painted by G. F. Lewis, and engraved by J. H. Robinson, is a charming performance; the original is characteristic, and filled with accessories as pleasing as they are cleverly expressed. Nor has the engraver failed in his share; the lightness and yet force of his touch cannot be surpassed in this style of art. With the other two subjects, "Calais Pier," painted by Cox, and engraved by W. J. Cooke, and "Llyn Idwal," by Robson, and W. R. Smith, we are not so well satisfied. In the former, all living and inanimate things are in a sort of huddle, and the sea-gull's wings are touching the sail of the boat: in the latter, Robson's sublime and gray distances are not preserved in the translation. Perspective is wanting.

MR. HAYDON is, we learn with pleasure, about to open an exhibition of some of his most esteemed pictures at the Egyptian Hall. Among some persons the malady goes so far as to pro-these are the Mock Election, liberally given duce sickness or diarrhose, and leaves the from the royal collection, the Xenophon Achillee playing his lyre, Mercury and Io, Dying Boy, and a great variety of other paintings and studies, which rank the artist so high in our mative school.

CHOLERA MORBUS.

THE EFFECTS OF FEAR.

CONCEIVING, as we do, that we could be more usefully employed than in discussing, where facts are opposed to opinion, we have drawn up a few notes upon a very peculiar malady which is constantly met with in towns where which is constantly met with in towns where of acute pain in the region of the stomach. the Cholers is raging, and may not improbably Dr. Becker says, "One must have experienced be recognised where the disease is not. It is characterised by a well-marked train of symptoms, and may, from its origin, be denominated Cholera-phobia. Dr. Becker, of Berlin, has alluded to something similar, under the name of Pseudo-Cholera; and a knowledge of the extent to which the feelings can go in producing discase, cannot but be of the highest importance, in order to enable every one to distinguish between the premonitory symptoms of a serious disorder, and an illness or indisposition pro-duced solely by mental causes. These symptoms may be produced in all sensible constitutions by any thing that turns the attention to the subject of Cholera. In females, conversation upon this theme of but too painful an interest, and the perusal of cases or of descriptions of disease, will be predisposing causes. We have known, in towns where the disease existed, the same symptoms to result from the sight of passing funerals or of sick persons being borne to the hospital. Medical men are also liable to the same feelings, from an intense conviction of the severity of the malady, or from dread of its contagious influence ; and others are even affected from being thrown into the company of medical men who may have visited cases of Cholera. The activity and bustle of the day is unfavourable to these symptoms, and they generally first declare themselves in the tranquillity and repose of the night, when, if not immediately conquered by a strong effort of the mind, they proceed to very considerable lengths, and assume quite a formidable character. It is well known that the horizontal position is, from the determination of blood to the head, favourable for thought : Sheridan and many intellectual persons have been in the habit of taking advantage of such situations to mature their conceptions, and the influence of moral excitement on the thus, what Dr. Johnson calls "the luxury of a vain imagination," is most indulged in by fanciful persons during the intervals of lying racterises the higher classes, are seldom, if awake. When the fear of a new and serious ever, affected by Cholers-phobia, while the disease is allowed to occupy the mind and prey upon the spirits, it soon works a wonderful change, manifesting the influence of the mind on the body, and, in susceptible persons, leading to immediate Cholera-phobia.

The first symptoms are a whirling in the head, a sensation of giddiness, accompanied by ringing in the ears; the patient tosses from side to side, and sometimes, to relieve the feeling themselves to be the victims of a pestilence. of excited anxiety, gets out of bed and walks Some eccentric writers lately proposed music about the room. At other times, the dread of as a preventive of cholers; might it not, by disease increases, the pit of the stomach falls diverting attention and pleasing the senses, in, the movements of the bowels are plainly rather avert those unpleasant sensations which felt, the breathing is hurried, and a profuse, duce sickness or diarrhose, and leaves the patient so weak and febrile, as to require two or three days for convalencence. The motion of the intestines which, in good health, is very simple, is called peristaltic. One portion after another is successively exerted to contract, partly by the acrimony, partly by the bulk, of the alimentary mass: from the attention which persons are apt to give, during the prevalence of Cholera, to the state of the digestive organs, this motion is constantly perceived, and becomes a source of great annoyance. The same causes act upon the stomach, diminishing its tone, and impeding the digestive powers, both of which produce unessiness, and often feelings in one's own person the singular feelings of a first week of Cholera, in order to conceive it possible how much individuals, in excellent health of body and mind, and, he says, free from all fear and anxiety, may thus suffer, merely in consequence of consciousness being directed towards the function of digestion." In some persons, a feeling of discomfort has continued for days and weeks: they have been languid, little inclined to their usual occupations; the stomach, as well as the lower part of the intestines, have been the seat of unusual sensations, sleep is disturbed by the involuntary thoughts of the approaching disease. In others, a sudden attack of anxiety, oppression of the chest, shivering, coldness of the extremities, has supervened, and caused great alarm to the patients and their friends. Many persons, otherwise in a good state of health, are subject to cramps, mostly on going to bed, though others are frequently awoke by them at early hours in the morning. In some, this irritable state of the muscular fibre is induced by fatigue; in others by tight shoes; but it is oftener connected with constitutional irritability, increased by improper diet. In some, the cramps confine themselves to the toes and palms of the feet; but in others, they embrace the calves of the legs, or the muscles of the arm and chest. This irritability cannot be looked upon as predisposing to Cholera; but it has always been found to be much influenced by the state of the mind, and would find a corrective in a tonic regimen, warmth, and men-tal determination. The numerous unusual sensations experienced during the prevalence of Cholera, have been considered by some as connected with an epidemic influence; but they are much more probably to be traced to system: the lower classes, for example, not possessing that refined sensibility which chaever, affected by Cholera-phobia, while the contrary would be the case if we considered the result of epidemic impregnation. The fact is, that they have not so much time to watch the progress of digestion; and have, additionally, too many things to occupy their thoughts to allow them to dwell upon disease till their heated imaginations lead them to conceive Some eccentric writers lately proposed music rather avert those unpleasant sensations which we have been describing? And if music pos-families, and spread itself all over the country, is as uncalled for as it is absurd. like consumption, Cholera spares the young and beautiful; and, unlike the plague, it seldom attacks the vigorous and the healthy; but it is a disease that will, with a few exceptions, spread in low, dirty lanes, on the river side, where it appears to find victims among the poorest and the most wretched. Cheerfulness and fearlessness are the best promoters of health, and consequently preventives of Cholera as well as of Cholera-phobia; and they cannot be insured more certainly than by the conscientious performance of our duty to our poorer fellow-creatures, and the exercise of our feelings of benevolence and humanity.

Cholera-phobia has been a very common disease in all the towns where Cholera existed; and many fashionable physicians, who never visited cases of the latter disease, got great praise for their very successful treatment of the former, which was by them considered as mild Cholera. Considering how few of the middling classes of society have suffered from this severe and cruel pestilence, we think we confer a benefit to certain classes by pointing out a cure for their visitation previous to the arrival. and during the prevalence of, the real Cholera. And this we think will at once be found in mental occupation, or constant engagement of the mind; and we do not know a more neverfailing source of interest and of calm enjoy-ment, than in alleviating the misfortunes of others, and by numerous little previsions, which it is now more especially in the power of the fair sex to make for the poor, to relieve the necessities of our fellow-creatures.

THE GARRICK CLUB PAPERS, NO. V.

Covent Garden Theatre.-At a meeting of the proprietors, renters, and others interested in this concern, on Monday, an agreement was come to which, we trust, will have the effect of disembarrassing it of its difficulties, and relieving it of those heavy burdens under which it has suffered so severely. The Duke of Bedthe symptoms constituting that disease to be ford, a large creditor, and ground-landlord, set a most liberal example, by foregoing and postponing a considerable portion of his claims; which was followed by the other shareholders and renters present. By this arrangement, if acceded to by parties who were not present, the theatre will be less pressed, to the amount of several thousand pounds a-year; and it might be hoped, from good management, that it would not only sustain itself, but the sinking character of the national drama.

We are indebted for the following jeud'esprit to a friend : it is hy Lieut .- General Sir clammy, and cold perspiration breaks out. DRAMA.

ADELPHI.

On Monday was produced, with most perfect success, The Forgery, or Reading of the Will; a piece written by Mr. Buckstone for the purpose of introducing tableaux vivans of Wilkie's celebrated pictures, The Village Politicians, and the Reading of the Will. The early part of the story traces the forgery of the document in question by two villains, John Neyland, Mr. Hemmings, the brother of the testator, and Lieutenant Lizzard, Mr. O. Smith, his accomplice, and an escaped convict. The latter portion shews the distress of the bereaved widow, Mrs. Yates, and her maternal trials in endeavouring to protect her son from the grasp of his unnatural guardians. Thornhill (Gallot), a friend, who finally rescues her and punishes the criminals; a churchwarden, Grub, J. Reeve; a cousin of the widow's, Miss Daly; Miss Diana Verjuice, a prying, censorious, and husband-hunting old maid, Mr. Yates; and her ser-vant, Jack Sprat, a little radical livery-man, Mr. Buckstone, fill up the measure of the dramatis persona, and carry on the action to the finale. The great attractions of this drama and they are very great even for the Adelphiare to be found in the two living pictures we have mentioned, than which nothing could be more perfect: they embody every figure and every expression of their admirable originals, and produce an effect of extraordinary interest. Then comes the pathetic personation of the widow by Mrs. Yates, in which her truth and feeling has raised a rival to her Victorine, as was witnessed by many tears, and not all shed by the softer sex. And Yates in the old maid, admirable, without the slightest caricature or buffoonery to betray the male representative of the petticoat: it is an extraordinary piece of acting throughout. On the first night there was too much of the comic churchwarden, the levelling footman, and parish business; but these being curtailed with judgment, The Forgery bids fair and deserves to be one of the most popular favourites yet produced at this theatre. All the performers exerted themselves to the utmost; and the whole presented one of those very efficient casts which have raised the Adelphi so high in histrionic estimation. Mr. Yates spoke an introductory address, written by Mr. Beazley, with great humour, and was rewarded by hearty laughter and applause. At the end Mr. Buckstone was called for, and also received the warm plaudits of the house.

UNREHEARSED STAGE EFFECTS:

King's Theatre, Feb. 22.—In the last scene of Otello, every flash of lightning distinctly revealed "the dreadful makers of the storm"—to wit, a group of carpenters with square paper caps!

Drury Lans, Feb. 22.—A laughable account might be given of every night's contentions at both the great theatres relative to the singing of "God save the King;" but as the dispute is among the profession, we leave them to resolve the discord of this harmony.

King's Theatre, Feb. 28.— In Elisa e Claudio, Act I., there was a desperate fray between "a gallery in the count's house' and "a room in the cottage of Elisa." The former was ascending with great decorum, when the latter caught hold of its skirt, from which, in spite of the former's efforts to disengage itself, a large piece, albeit stiffened with wood, was torn in the struggle. Hereupon the maimed combatant, either through inadequacy to escape, or revenge at the injury, returned down into its original situation, and hiding its opponent from sight, produced, the side-scenes having duly changed, a most enigmatical ensemble. Anon the combined sounds saluted our ears of the gentle symphony for Meric's first song, and the loud carpenter's hammer repairing the injury. Elisa, the concealed inmate of the cottage, entered the gallery in her foe the count's house. and boldly began singing about her children where their very existence was so close a secret but anon, after considerable fidgetting, up rushed the gallery, alike to the utter destruction of a silvery roulade and some half dozen lampglasses at the side-scene! La Somnambule had scarcely commenced, when Mademoiselle Varins. a première danseuse, tumbled down into a most extraordinary shape upon hands and knees! She soon, however, righted, though she looked very sulky about it all night.

Covent Garden, Feb. 29. - Next night a similar accident befell Miss Inversity (in the Fiend Father). In scampering off the stage in the second scene, she tumbled over the demon of fire's elaborately-jointed and, on this occasion, ill-closed trap-door, and fell quite flat upon her face! As her head was from the audience, and her heels towards them, I forbear to particularise.

New Strand Theatre, March 1 .- " Paul Pry by a gentleman, his first appearance on London boards," rolled out of a box in which he was hidden, at the end of an act, and rolled so far, that but for the lamps, he would, like Reeve and Lablache, have rolled into the orchestra; and the curtain immediately falling, he was cleanly shut out on the wrong side! A practised droll might have turned this ludicrous accident to account; but the "gentleman, his first appearance on London boards," remained lying on the same nearly a minute, face downward, considering what might best be done or said. After this cogitation, mark the brilliant issue. He rose, looked at the curtain, and walked out! Surely this blunder of inexperience was not worth engrafting on the piece; yet on Saturday last, March 3, he treated us with its fac-simile, even to its lame and impotent conclusion. Such manœuvres, when purposed, are only worthy of Punch or Bartholomew-fair, where, too, they generally have wit to excuse them.

Adelphi, March 5.—Yates's "Apology for Petticoats" should have commenced with one for the green baize one which prevented his entering, and gave umbrage to the audience for more than a minute, while it skirmished with the act-drop behind it, after the manner of the two opera scenes described above. Buckstone was called for at the end of The Forgery, and Yates led him on. He was in great perturbation and a brown great-coat, and tried to conceal the expression of the former in his face by hiding it in the collar of the latter. Yates said, in his usual good-humoured manner, " Rather unusual perhaps—but really—the author of so many successful pieces—" and he led out Modest-merit by the brown great-coat sleeve.

Drury Lane, March 6.—Mr. C. Jones, in Masaniello, fell floundering down, while trying to dance; making the sixth clumsy stage sprawl I had seen from Tuesday to Tuesday! There were green-and-red footmen among the revolutionists, poking out the curtain to save the groups on their much more than hundredth them available; and it is much to be feared night's practice!

THE Società Harmonica held their first mention the names of Lindley and Dragonetti, Roch, rue St. Honoré..... Galignani's Messenger.

whose trio with Brooks, the double bass and the two violoncellos, elicited a unanimous encore. Mori executed a fantasia in his very best style; and we have seldom heard Mr. H Phillips to greater advantage than in "The Stormy Petrel." His rich deep voice and Neukomm's noble and inspired compositions seem made for each other, "so wondrously they go together." The whole was a fine musical treat, and most worthy of all who love the concord of sweet sounds.

VARIETIES.

Naval and Military Library Museum .- This Institution appears to be carried on with great zeal and success: it consists of nearly 2,000 members, has a balance of some 1,200%. at the banker's, and is constantly being enriched with valuable donations suited to its plan and objects.

A new edition of the Emperor Kang-he's Dictionary has issued from the imperial press. The work has been three years in hand, and now comes forth with the promise of being a corrected and accurate edition. It consists of forty Chinese volumes. Two copies are to be sent to the library of Mougden, and a certain number bestowed on kings, ministers of state, and governors of provinces. - Canton Register.

Labourer's Friend Society. - We again earnestly recommend the attention of our readers to the object of this Society - the improvement of the condition of the agricultural labourer by the cultivation of small allotments of land. The publications of the Society afford abundant proof of the important benefits derived where this system has been carried into effect, — decrease of poor's-rates, decrease of crime, and increase of comfort to the labouring poor. Since the annual meeting lately held, we are happy to find the patronage of H. R. H. the Duchess of Kent, and of H. G. the Duke of Bedford, has been extended to the Society .-While the benevolent and beneficial system of allotting land in small portions for cultivation by the poor is thus only beginning to make its way in our enlightened England, it is curious to transcribe the following paragraph, respecting the practice in China, from a publication of the celestial empire in 1831: "Governor Le has suggested a method of preventing the formation of secret societies: it is, to give permission to all who for want of employment are obliged to remain idle, to cultivate unoccupied lands as their own family property, with perpetual remission from paying the land-tax. By adopting this arrangement, already practised in the four western districts, Kaou-chow, Leenchow, Luy-chow, and Keung-chow, many persons, who are incapable of paying the tax, will be enabled to gain a livelihood, and likewise be kept from falling into bad company and evil practices." Fas est ab China doceri .- Ed. L. G.

We regret to announce, that M. Champollion, member of the Académie des Inscriptions, died yesterday, after a long and painful illness He was in his 42d year. By his death, the scientific world sustains an irreparable loss. The light which his indefatigable researches had thrown on the obscurity of Egyptian history had only acquired sufficient intensity to point us to the treasures which were concealed there. without enabling us to examine and render that, as our lamented countryman, Dr. Young, has preceded him to the tomb, he has left no one survivor adequate to the task of completing concert last Monday. The orchestra is much his unfinished labours. His obsequies will take improved, in witness whereof we need only place to-morrow morning in the church of St.

Constable's Miscellany.—The remaining stock and copyright of this well-conducted Miscellany were sold last week in London, in consequence of the state of the copartnery by which it was carried on. The purchase was made eventually at 3428/. 13s. 4d. for a private individual, unconnected with the bookselling trade; for whom the work is to be published in future—in London by Whittaker and Co., and in Edinburgh by Constable and Co. The copyright belonged to Messrs. Hurst, Chance, and Co. four shares, Mr. H. Constable one share, and Mr. J. Aitken, the very able and efficient editor, one share. The past vols. were taken at eightpence. We have seen a small pamphlet with testimonials of the merits of Mr. Aitken (among others those of Professor Wilson, Mr. Lockhart, Mr. James, Mr. Motherwell, Mr. Charles Maclaren, Mr. Robert Chambers, Mr. M'Diarmid, &c.) in the sentiments contained in which we take this public opportunity, from long observation of his taste and judgment, of expressing our entire concurrence. Should he resign the helm, it will not be easy to substitute an equally able steersman.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We cannot give the information sought by "a Sub-scriber from the commencement of the Gazette," where he can find a full account set forth of the human voice by Dr. Bell.

We omitted to mention last week that the very beautiful volume of Mr. Bryant's which we then reviewed is brought out under the auspices and edited by Mr. Washington Irving: another of the many claims to gratitude which that accomplished author has laid upon the united literature of England and America.

Mr. Astley's (Liverpool) very liberal letter has been communicated to Mr. Lander: It is a curious fact, that two prayer-books belonging to the brothers, and lost by them in the interior of Africa, at which they have always environment of the property of them in the interior of Africa, at which they have always expressed much regret, should so soon have found their way to an English port. Apropos of the travellers, we believe that Mr. John Lander had yesterday the honour of presenting his work to the King, at Windsor, The royal friend of saliors and bold adventurers, by commanding this to be done, has given another proof of the deep interest he feels in such enterprises.

Mr. Faraday's Lecture at the Royal Institution in our next.

next.

We can only mention three valuable works, which reached us in the course of Wednesday, too late for examination and review in this Gazette: viz. Niebuhr's History of Rome, vol. ii.; Clarke's Succession of Sacred Literature, vol. ii.; and Tenneman's Manual of the History of Philosophy; every one of them deserving the best attention of the scholar and the praise of the critic.

great, and, what is beitter, it is usefully employed."—Shiffleid Mercary.

"The New Monthly commences a new year with greater spirit and vivacity, more sterling talent, and a stronger determination than ever to compete successfully with its consemporaries."—Typac Mercary.

"The attractions of this excellent periodical increases with each succeeding number. If to decover success be to obtain it, the New Monthly will soon be (if it is not at present) at the head of the periodicals of the day."—Shiffled Mercary.

"The New Monthly Magnatine has, with the commencement of the new year, put forth strong claims to public patronage. If it is present to the periodical so the day is the same to the new year, and forth strong claims to public patronage. If it is present to the same to follow, we may sadely present this magnatical likely to become the very best which is now published. It is just what we expect a monthly periodical to be—full of variety, "from grave to pay," every article bearing the impress of superior, and some of very unusual shifty."—Develop Mercary.

"The New Monthly begins the year with a very after samber, and, while perfectly decided in its politics, its opinions are ex-the impress of superior, and some of very numeal ability. —Derby Rercery.

"The New Monthly begins the year with a very sitle number, and, while perfectly decided in its politics, its opinions are expressed in a temperate and rational spirit. Unlike those periodicals which are 'nurtured in convalaton,' and missister to the had passions of men, it never decounds to valgar vituperation, nor loses the proud distinction of gentleman-like discussion. Altogether, the new year's number of the New Monthly is worthy of its gifted editor, whose well-knews takents afford the best possible guarantee of continued and ossistance accellence."—Reliaburgh Observer.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

THE LANDERS' AFRICAN TRAVELS. [Second Notice.]

IN our last No. we intimated the royal condescension, through which these enterprising and distinguished travellers were admitted to the presence of the King, to whom they had the honour to offer the history of their adventures and discoveries, in three volumes. From this work we have already had the pleasure of laving a characteristic specimenextract before our readers; and we are happy to feel ourselves now at liberty to make them farther acquainted with a production so creditable to British spirit and talent. Previous to doing so, however, it may be interesting to mention some particulars relative to the authors. The Landers, as we stated to be in contemplation, presented their book on Saturday to his Majesty, at Windsor; upon which occasion his Majesty graciously entered into conversation with them, and for an hour directed his inquiries to the peculiarities and resources of the country through which they had passed. During this time the King read the preface and the commencement of the introduction (written, we rather think, by Lieut. Becher, an elaborate and admirable treatise of sixty pages, on the geographical history of the Niger, Joliba, and Quorra,) and observed to the brothers, that Richard "must go to Tim-buctoo;" and asked him if he "had got his instructions from the Colonial Office." This reminds us of the statement we made in a recent Literary Gazette,+ respecting a second trip, which was proposed into the interior of Africa. We now learn it is decided that R. Lander shall go out again. He goes in a steam-boat, provided by some merchants of Liverpool (where he now is), and on a trading voyage. After reaching Rabba (with his departure from which the second volume ends), by this conveyance, he is to leave the steamer, and proceed for Timbuctoo under orders from the Government. On his return to Rabba he will re-embark, and descending the Niger, happily we trust, take his course homeward for his native land. So much of certainty is anticipated from the employment of a steamvessel, that though he will sail from Liverpool, probably, in May, he is expected back in England before the end of autumn.

Presuming that this brief account of the future plan would be acceptable to our friends, and earnestly hoping for the successful termination of this expedition, we now take up our customary task of reviewing the past. first volume conducts the travellers to Boossa; the second (as we have noticed) ends with their departure from Rabba; the third with their safe arrival in England. We give their earliest acquaintance with the river at Boossa. Presents were laid at the feet of the illustrious occupants of that throne, the most potent of the former more especially was extravagant in expressions of admiration and thankfulness. A pair of silver bracelets, a tobacco-pipe, and a looking-glass, seemed to rivet the attention of the king, who could not take his eyes off them for a full half hour, so much was he pleased with them. This morning we visited the farfamed Niger or Quorra, which flows by the city, about a mile from our residence; and were greatly disappointed at the appearance of this celebrated river. Black, rugged rocks rose abruptly from the centre of the stream, causing strong ripples and eddies on its surface. It is said that, a few miles above Boossa, the river is divided into three branches, by two small fertile islands, and that it flows from hence in one continued stream to Funda. The Niger here, in its widest part, is not more than a stone's-throw across at present. The rock on which we sat overlooks the spot where Mr. Park and his associates met their unhappy fate; we could not help meditating on that circumstance, and on the number of valuable lives which have been sacrificed in attempting to explore this river, and secretly implored the Almighty that we might be the humble means of setting at rest for ever the great question of its course and termination."

Having gone from Boossa to Yaoorie, the Sultan tried to keep them as long as he could, looking out for contingencies like a true politician, and some of his expedients are amusing enough.

" One of the inducements urged by this monarch for our longer stay with him, is rather whimsical. He has made us a present of a quantity of worthless feathers, which he had caused to be plucked from the body of a live ostrich; and because he entertained an opinion that if others were added to them, they would altogether form a very acceptable present to our gracious sovereign, he informed us that it would be necessary we should wait till such time as the ostrich should regain its plumage, in order for that part of its body which had not been previously plucked to undergo that operation; for the weather, he asserted, was much too cold for the bird to lose all its feathers at one and the same time. And further, to encourage their growth, he would order that two thousand cowries worth of butter (about twelve pounds weight) should be diligently rubbed into the skin of the animal. This money has actually been deducted by the sultan, for this express purpose, from the sum which he was indebted to us, because he said he did not approve of paying for the butter from his own pocket.

At last, " Aug. 1, this morning the sultan sent a messenger to inform us that we were at

Western Africa, as Bornou is of the northern part,—the king and queen. | Ibberty to pay our respects and take our farewell of him previous to our departure from the city, and which we have been assured will take place tomorrow without any further procrastination or delay. We presently obeyed the summons, for such we considered it; and on our arrival at the sultan's residence, we were introduced into a large, gloomy, uncomfortable apartment, wherein the monarch generally receives his more distinguished visitors. A number of naked girls and hoys, his domestics, were continually passing through it to other parts of the building, carrying dirty calabashes in their hands; a quantity of swallows' nests were attached to the ceiling of the room (for neither here nor elsewhere are these birds ever molested), and their twittering owners, which were flying about in all directions, fed their young without interruption, and added not a little filthiness to the unswept and unclean apartment. In the centre and opposite the door-way, the ruler of Yaoorie was squatting on a platform, which was covered with faded damask, and smoking from a pipe of huge dimensions. On each side of him was a large pillow; and behind him, affixed to the wall, was a large square piece of ancient-looking figured silk, very rich and of various colours, with a beautiful deep fringe. It was, however, a little tarnished, owing to the length of time it has been in the sultan's possession. This once splendid and valuable article is said to have been brought from the celebrated Musser, a place of which every one here speaks in the most rapturous and extravagant terms. The dress of the sultan corresponded with the dirtiness of the apartment. Just before our introduction we had been cautioned not to offer to shake hands with him, for that would be considered too familiar on our parts, and would be rejected by the monarch. Our compliments were therefore confined to simple inquiries after his health. The conversation during the interview was as uninteresting and spiritless as our conversations with other native rulers have always been - a description of one being a sample for the whole. The most important point were an urgent request on the part of the sultan for one of our lancets which he had seen, and the promise of a calabash of honey, which we received in the evening. We then took our leave and returned home. Here we were soon intruded upon by the sultan's daughters and friends, who, finding that we were actually to go on the morrow, had come to purchase buttons, beg medicine, and pay their last respects; and we were not only subjected to the most wearisome and provoking ceremonies in the world during the remainder of the Sabbath, but we were likewise constrained to be selling and wrangling with a parcel of noisy women till sunset, when we ungallantly drove them

They descended the Cubbie, a stream which falls into the Niger, and soon entering the latter, we have the following graphic description of it.

Soon after, it is related (Sunday, June 20): "The king sent a messenger this morning to inform us that he was a tailor, and that he would thank us for some thread and a few needles for his own private use. By this man he likewise sent a musket for us to repair; but as it is Sunday, we have declined doing it till to-morrow."

 No. 766, for Feb. 11, 1832, p. 90.

"On all the borders of the numerous branches of the river, as well as on its small islands. vast quantities of corn were growing; and it being near the time of harvest, it was nearly ripe, and waved over the water's edge very prettily. Platforms were every where erected to the height of, or rather above the corn, which grows as high as ten or twelve feet. People were stationed on these to scare away the numerous flights of small birds, which do great mischief, and would, without this precaution, destroy the hopes of the cultivator. A boy or girl, and in many cases a woman with a child at her breast, and even a whole family together, we observed on the platforms, amusing themselves in this manner, without the slightest shade or covering of any kind to shelter them from the fierceness of the sunbeams. Standing erect and motionless, many of them looked like statues of black marble rather than living human beings; but others, particularly the wo-men, disregarding their duty, were industriously employed in plaiting straw, supplying the wants of their children, manufacturing mats, dressing provisions, &c. In order the more effectually to frighten away the birds, several of the watchers were furnished with slings and stones, in the use of which they seem to be very skilful; besides these, lines of rope were fastened from the platform to a tree at some distance, to which large calabashes were suspended, with holes in them, through which sticks were passed, so that when the line is pulled away they make a loud clattering The calabashes are sometimes fastened noise ' whole to the rope, containing about a handful of stones, which answer the purpose of making a noise when put in motion, as well as the sticks. To this is often added the hallooing and screaming of the watchers, which is dismal enough to frighten an evil spirit, and it rarely fails to produce the desired effect. The inhabitants of many of the numerous walled towns and open villages on the banks of the Niger. and also of the islands, we find are for the most part Cumbrie people—a poor, despised, and abused, but industrious and hard-working race. They are but too often oppressed and persecuted by their more fortunate and powerful neighbours, who affirm that they are fitted by nature only for slaves, and are therefore invariably treated by them as such. The Cumbrie also inhabit many parts of Haussa and other countries; they speak different languages, but they have all the same pursuits. superstitions, amusements, and peculiar manners, to which they firmly and scrupulously adhere, both in good and bad fortune, in sick-ness and in health, in freedom and slavery, at home and in foreign countries, notwithstanding the scorn and derision to which it subjects them; and they are known to cherish and maintain them to the end of life, with as much pertinacity as the Hebrew does his faith and national customs. Inheriting from their ancestors a peaceful, timid, passionless, incurious disposition, they fall an easy prey to all who choose to molest them; they bow their necks to the yoke of slavery without a murmur, and think it a matter of course; and perhaps no people in the world are to be found who are less susceptible of intense feeling and the finer emotions of the human mind, on being stolen away from their favourite amusements and pursuits, and from the bosom of their wives and families, than these Cumbrie people, who are held in such general disesteem. Thousands of them reside in the kingdom of Yaoorie and its province of Engarski; and most of the slaves in the capital have been taken from among them. The tribute, or rather rent. which they pay to the sultan for the land they cultivate, consists of a quantity of corn. about the size of a bundle as much as a man can carry, for every plot of land, whether it be large or small. When, however, the harvest fails, they are at liberty to give a certain num-ber of cowries in lieu of the accustomed duty of corn. If the poor have no means of paying their rent when it becomes due, the sultan immediately despatches a body of horsemen to their villages, with a command to seize and carry away as many of the people as they may think proper. It sometimes happens, however, that the sultan of Yaoorie pulls the reins of oppression with too tight a hand: and as cowards, when driven to desperation, often give specimens of extraordinary courage and resolution, so the negligent and despised Cumbrie. writhing under the lash of injuries which they have never deserved, defend themselves with extraordinary determination and bravery, and not unfrequently come off victorious from the conflict. The benefit which results to them from these advantages is an exemption from the payment of rent for two or three subsequent years. During our residence in Yaoorie. an expedition despatched by the sultan for the above purpose, returned unsuccessful from En. garski. The most unfavourable trait in the character of the Cumbrie is their extreme dirti. ness, both as regards their persons and habitations, from which not one of them appears to be free. They are generally considered good agriculturists and expert fishermen: they grow abundance of corn and onions, but a great part of the former is disposed of to the natives of Boossa and Yaoorie, to whose monarchs they are subject. Most of them are rather slovenly about their persons, and make use of few ornaments, and even these are of the commonest description. They hore immense holes in the lobe of the ear for the admission of bits of fine coloured wood; and the soft part of the septum of the nose is perforated in like manner, through which is thrust a long piece of blue glass. When the females have a mind to appear with unusual smartness and effect, a crocodile's tooth is inserted through both lips, and project upwards as far as the nose. These useless, unbecoming, and singular ornaments, impart to the countenance an unnatural and barbarous expression, which is very far from agreeable, and produces an unpleasant and painful emotion in the mind of the beholder. In our intercourse with the Cumbrie, they appeared mild, innocent, and even amiable in their manners; and they behaved to us with all the civility, hospitality, and kindness of their natures, untinctured by insincerity or lukewarmness."

Our countrymen revisited Wow-wow, the sultan of which was a friendly old man; and dropped down the river, landing at sundry places, and meeting with various treatment, as the caprices of the chiefs dictated. In this course we find traits of landscape and manners with which we shall for the present conclude.

"Tuesday, Oct. 5th.—Before sunrise this morning, our luggage was removed to the beach. and between six and seven o'clock we were once more upon the water. Just below the town of Bajiebo, the Niger spreads itself into two noble branches, of nearly equal width, formed by an island. We preferred journeying on the eastern, but for no particular reason. The country be-yond the banks was very fine. The island in the middle of the river is small, but verdant, woody, and handsome; and we passed by the derable velocity. It was then that both banks presented the most delightful appearance. They were embellished with mighty trees and elegant shrubs, which were clad in thick and luxuriant foliage, some of lively green, and others of darker hues; and little birds were singing merrily among their branches. Magnificent festoons of creeping plants, always green, hung from the tops of the tallest trees, and dromine to the water's edge, formed immense natural grottoes, pleasing and grateful to the eye, and seemed to be fit abodes for the Naiades of the rivor I

"Oct. 6.—We came suddenly in sight of an elevated rock, which is called Mount Kess by the natives, and almost at the same instant we found ourselves abreast of it. It forms a small island, and is probably not less than three hundred feet in height, which renders it a conspicuous and remarkable object. It is excessively steep, and rising out of the river as it does in appearance is irresistibly imposing, and majestic beyond expression. Its base is fringed by venerable trees, and less magnificent vegetation. which also strives to spring forth from its barren and almost naked sides. The height of Mount Kesa, its solitary position, and the peculiarity of its form, distinguish it from every other, and render it an object of more than common interest. It is greatly venerated by the natives of this part of the country, and, as may readily be imagined, favours the superstitious notions which are attached to it by a simple and credulous people, who, like the vulgar of Europe. are fond of the marvellous. The story attached to Mount Kesa is of a very romantic nature. The natives believe that a benevolent genius makes the mountain his favourite and continual abode, and dispenses around him a benign and heavenly influence. Here the misfortunes of the unhappy are alleviated, the wants of the needy supplied, and the lamentations of the mourner turned to joy: sin, sorrow, and suffering, are unknown; solemnity gives place to merriment, and the solicitude of futurity to present enjoyment and thoughtless jocularity. But more especially, say the natives, the weary traveller here finds a refuge from the storm, and a rest from his toils; here he reposes in the delights of security, and revels in the comforts of ease. However, to obtain all this, he makes known his wants and desires to the spirit of the mountain by supplication and prayer, when they are instantly answered; he receives the most delicate and excellent food from invisible hands, and when sufficiently invigorated by refreshment, he is at liberty either to continue his journey or remain awhile to participate in the blessings of the mountain. Such is the story we received from these superstitious people of this celebrated mount.

We have next day the description of a king with a name fit for a European romance, but who does not seem to be a fool as to real enjoyments notwithstanding.

"So early as five o'clock in the morning our canoes were loaded, and having breakfasted on a slice of yam, we were fully prepared to quit the island. But as it was not deemed either politic or proper to go away till the arrival of the great King of the Dark Water, who was hourly expected, and who might be inclined to construe our departure into contempt, we consented to await his coming. Though we have been exposed to a thousand nuisances, and all manner of inconveniences, and are pretty well reconciled to them all, yet rather than remain in a close black hut full of men, whose garments are generally covered with vermin, and side of it in a very few minutes, with consi-rarely, if ever, cleaned, and who make it a canoes, and having pushed off from the land, we waited the islander's arrival under the branches of a large tree, at a little distance from the town. Between nine and ten, A.M., we heard a number of men singing, and keeping time to the metion of many paddles, but we could see no one. However, in a very few minutes, a cance, which was paddled by a few men only, came in sight, and we knew by this that the Water King was approaching. It was instantly followed by another, and much larger one, propelled by above twenty very fine young men, whose voices we had been listening to just before, and who were still continuing their song. Their music was slower, but very similar to that which may be heard on many parts of the western coast. The King of the Dark Water was with them. As the cance drew nearer, we were not only surprised at its extraordinary length and uncommon neatness, but likewise at the unusual display of pomp and shew which we observed in her. In the centre a mat awning was erected, which was va-riously decorated, and on the front of it hung a large piece of scarlet cloth, ornamented with bits of gold lace stitched on different parts of it. In the bow of the canoe were three or four little boys, of equal size, who were clad with neatness and propriety; and in the stern sat a number of comely-looking musicians, consisting of several drummers and a trumpeter, whilst the young men who had the management of the boat were not inferior to their companions teither in decency of apparel or respectability of appearance. They all looked in fact extremely well. As soon as this canoe arrived at the landing-place, the Water King came out from beneath the awning, and, followed by the musicians and a suite of attendants, walked to the hut wherein all public matters are transacted, and whither, in a few minutes, we ourselves were desired to repair. The chief of the island, with his elders and the more respectable of the people, were seated, on our entrance, on each side of their important visitor; and my brother and I. as a mark of distinction, were invited to place ourselves in front of him. When the usual compliments had passed on both sides. he informed us, with much solemnity, of his rank and title; he then alluded to the cause of his coming, which he said was to do us honour, and repeated what had previously been told us by the king's son. This being done, the presented us with a pot of excellent honey, and two thousand cowries in money, besides a large quantity of goors nuts, which are cultivated in the country, and which are held in so alone have the means of procuring them. Having nothing further to say or do, we shook hands with his sable majesty, whose name is Suliken Rouah, expressed our acknowledgements for his handsome present, and returned to our boats. The King of the Dark Water is a fine-looking man, well stricken in years; his skin as black as a coal; his features are coarse but benevolent, and his stature advantageous and commanding. He was dressed in a full bornouse, or Arab cloak, of inferior blue cloth, underneath which was a variegated tobe, made of figured satin, country cloth, and crimson silk damask, all patched together; he likewise wore a cap of red cloth, Haussa trousers, and sandals of coloured leather. Two pretty little beauty. They have also a prodigious number boys, about ten years of age and of equal size, of excellent horses, of which they take the and who acted in capacity of pages, followed him into the hut. Their clothing was neat and for their strength and elegant proportions. becoming, and their persons nicely clean; each These animals are used only for war, recreacommon practice to sit on the mat whereon we of them was furnished with an ornamented tion, and in travelling. It is the pride and alone, rather than do this we stopped into our low's tail, and they stood one on his right hand pleasure of the higher classes to dress well, and and the other on his left, to brush away flies and other insects from his person, and supply him with goora-nuts and tobacco. The king was also accompanied by six of his wives, fine handsome jet-black girls, dressed in neat country caps edged with red silk. Native clothes, made of cotton and silk, were fastened round their waists, beneath which they wore a sort of short freck. The usual custom of steining their fingers and toe-nails with henna anpears to be general among them; their wrists were ornamented with neat silver bracelets, and their necks with coral necklaces. To such a man as the 'Water King,' with such a suite and such a title, the greatest honour is expected to be paid, and we therefore shewed our respect by saluting him with a discharge from two or three muskets."

In company with his Majesty of the Dark Waters, the Landers descended, in great (African) state to Rabba. Here (prefaced by a whimsical illustration) we are told-

"White men, how sorry soever their outward appearance may be, are certainly considered, not only by Falátahs, but by the native blacks as well, as a superior order of beings, in all respects more excellent than themselves. At Yaoorie we recollect having overheard a conversation between two men, who were quarrelling in the very height of passion. What!' exclaimed one of them to his fellow. O thou pitiful son of a black ant! dost thou presume to say that a horse was my father? Look at these Christians! for as they are, I am; and such were my ancestors; answer me not, I say, for I am a white man!' The speaker was a negro, and his skin was the colour of charcoal.

"Rabba appears from Zagoshie to be a considerably large, neat, clean, and well-built town, though it is unwalled, and is not otherwise fenced. It is irregularly built on the slope of a gently-rising hill, at the foot of which runs the Niger; and in point of rank, population, and wealth, it is the second city in the Falatah dominions, Soccatoo alone being considered as its superior. It is inhabited by a mixed population of Falátahs, Noufauchie, and emigrants and slaves from various countries; and is governed by a ruler, who exercises sovereign authority over Rabba and its dependencies, and is styled sultan or king. The regal power is despotic, though exercised with mildness, and the succession hereditary. The Arabs and all strangers have an enclosure of dwellings to themselves, which is in the suburbs of the town. Rabba is famous for milk, oil, and honey. The market, when our messengers were there, appeared to be well supplied with bullocks, horses, mules, asses, sheep, goats, and abundance of poultry. Rice, and various sorts of corn, cotton, cloth, indigo, saddles and bridles made of red and vellow leather, besides shoes, boots, and sandals, were offered for sale in great plenty. Although they observed about two hundred slaves for sale, none had been disposed of when they left the market in the evening. The inhabitants grow abundance of corn and rice, and other productions common to the neighbouring countries; and they cultivate the plantain shrub with success. They possess large flocks and herds of the finest description, and their horned cattle are remarkable for their size and display their persons and their horsemanship to advantage; and it is gratifying to witness the grace and dexterity with which they preserve their command over these beautiful creatures. In the management of their horses, they are perhaps not inferior to the Arabs, from whom they have, in all probability, derived most of their lessons in the art. Rabba is not very famous for the number or variety of its artificers. and yet in the manufacture of mats and sandals they are unrivalled. However, in all other handicrafts, Rabba yields to Zagoshie. Za-goshie, situated as it is, directly opposite Rabba, participates in many of its advantages, though still it has various inconveniences peculiar to itself. The town is built on a bog, for such it appears to us; and it lies so close to the water, hat in fact hundreds of buts are literally standing in it. So little regard do the people appear to have for what is termed comfort, that they suffer the walls of their dwellings either to fail to pieces, or permit large chinks and holes to remain in them, which freely admit the wind and rain; while the floors, which are made of earth or clay, are so soft and damp, that a slender stick may easily be thrust into them by the hand to any depth. Our own is of this description. In so moist a situation as this, it may readily be supposed the air in the night season is illuminated with fire-flies; and the huts of the natives are infested with mosquitoes and other disgusting insects, which abound in-deed in millions. When the Niger subsides, and leaves Zagoshie exposed with all its dirt to the influence of the sun, the noxious vapours and exhalation with which the air must of necessity be impregnated, will render it no doubt very insalubrious; but at present the inhabitants make few or no complaints. In their huts the people exhibit no very favourable specimens of taste or cleanliness; and in this respect, certainly, they are greatly inferior to their neighbours on the other side of the river. However, in their persons they are by no means so negligent, for they always appear extremely well dressed; and we have rarely met with so large a number of tall, handsome, well-formed men and comely women, as in this place. The care which the Falatah bestows, and the pride which he takes in his horse, are employed and indulged by the inhabitants of Zagoshie in an equal proportion in their canoes; the Niger is covered with these little vessels; and to be skilful in the management of them is their greatest boast. The chief of the island has about six hundred canoes. They are fond of aquatic occupations, even to a passion, and carry them to excess. All the trade by water in these parts is in their hands, and they are proprietors of the ferry to and from Rabba, which is a source of considerable emolument to those engaged in this speculation. They are also excellent fishermen, and, in fact, the population of Zagoshie are almost amphibious, so prone are they to be perpetually sporting in bogs or dabbling in water. But they do not confine themselves all the year round entirely to the river, for they cultivate the soil as well, and, like their countrymen of Nouffie, in the manufacture of various articles they evince considerable ingenuity and expertness. The cloth which they manufacture in common with their countrymen, and the tobes and trousers which they make, are most excellent, and would not disgrace a European manufactory; they are worn and valued by kings, chiefs, and great men, and are the admiration of the neighbouring nations, which vainly attempt to imitate them. We have also seen a variety of caps, which are worn solely by females, and made of cotton interwoven with silk, of the most exquisite workmanship. The people here are uncommonly industrious, be they males or females, and are always busy either in some domestic employment or other private occupation. In our walks we see them employed in spinning cotton, making the cloth; also neat wooden bowls; blacksmiths employed in making stirrups and bits for bridles, hoes, and such implements; tailors making dresses, saddlers making saddles, accoutrements for horses, shoes and sandals; other people making mats, all of which are destined for the Rabba market. We have not seen a single public amusement since we have been among them. In this respect they are an example to their neighbours. They seem quite independent of all authority, and above all restraint, except that of the legi-timate King of the Dark Water, and their own interests induce them to obey him alone. They care as little for the Falatahs as the Falatahs for them; the peculiarity of their situation renders them secure from foreign invasion, and insensible to the calamities and distresses which overwhelm the natives of many parts of the continent. They have liberty stamped on their features, and lightness and activity, so rarely to be seen in this country of sluggards, are observable in all their actions. The generality of the people are well-behaved; they are hospitable and obliging to strangers; they dwell in amity with their neighbours, and live in unity, peace, and harmony, among themselves; they are made bold by freedom, affluent by industry and frugality, healthy by exercise and labour, and happy from a combination of all these blessings. The population of Zagoshie cannot well be estimated, on account of its lowness and the prevailing flatness of the country round, on which neither a hillock nor eminence of any kind can be discerned. However, it must be immense; and we consider it to be one of the most extensive and thickly inhabited towns, as well as one of the most important trading places in the whole kingdom of Nouffie, not excepting even Coulfò. According to our estimation, the island may be about fifteen miles long, and three in breadth, but the greater part of it is now nearly overflowed. Notwithstanding this, the natives appear to enjoy good health."

Francis the First; an Historical Drama. By Frances Ann Kemble. 8vo. pp. 142. London, 1832. Murray.

MISS KEMBLE has all in her favour-our memories and our hopes: we cannot but feel that we may well be glad to pay to the youthful aspirant some portion of the gratitude we owe to her distinguished relatives; and we cannot but look forward to her own future, as if genius ought to be a heritage. Our young actress is not the first of her family who has aspired to unite the honours of the closet and the stage. John Kemble wrote both a tragedy and a comedy; Charles Kemble is the author of a drama, called The Wandcrer, and other productions; and Mrs. C. Kemble the Day after the Wedding, and (if we recollect rightly) Smiles and Tears. None of these efforts have taken high standard rank; but they show the literary taste of the Kemble family, and their desire to look beyond the mechanical part of their profession and in that lies the secret of their excellence. The tragedy before us has much of grace and good taste, rather than any striking indication of genius. As is the case with the productions of most young writers, the models are easily traced :- Zanga, in the Revenge, has given the hint for the vindictive Spaniard; and the sacrifice of Françoise's honour for her brother's life is from Measure for Measure. The versification is more that of a highly cultivated than a naturally musical ear: witness such prosaic lines as " I saw them both enter the queen's apartment—"

" Truly such origin doth honour to your quarrel."

But to a fault so easily rectified we do no more than allude. To us, the most objectionable passage in the whole play is the following one:

assage in the whole play is the following one:

'Say, then, if such a shew of chastity
Ere sat on lips that have been hot with passion?
Or such a pale cold hue did ever rest
On cheeks, where burning kiases have call'd up
The crimson blood, in blushes all as warm?
Look on her yet, and say if ever form
Shewed half so like a breathing place of marble.
Off with thy specious sceming, thou deceiver!
And dom a look that better suits thy state.
Oh, well-dissembled sin! say, was it thus,
Shrinking, and pale, thou stood'st, when the king's arms
Did clasp thee, and his hot lip seared from thine
Their oath to wed thy brother's friend?"
This is an imistation of the older dramatists.

This is an imitation of the older dramatists, and is too merely a physical picture for the pen of a female_a fault, however, entirely to be ascribed to a (we think) mistaken following of the early English models. Indeed, when we consider in what a fastidious age we live, it surprises us that so much remains to be done towards purifying the language of the drama. Expressions are still left in the mouth of the actress ill suited often to her sex and youth. We are the more anxious to point Miss Kemble's attention to that to which she can so easily apply the remedy, and which, being remedied, will contribute so greatly to her fame and success. The plot of Francis the First is divided into two parts: first, that relating to the fortunes of the Duc de Bourbon, whose transcript is historical. A closer adherence to the actual fact would have been better; for, in the thoughtless and violent hero, little justice is done to the high-minded and noble Duc de Bourbon. But the real interest of the piece, and the real development of Miss Kemble's powers, is in the character and fate of the gentle and unfortunate Françoise de Foix. Like Barry Cornwall's "delicate Sicilian girl," who cherished a secret passion for the monarch Don Pedro, Françoise secretly loves the king. At a tournament, the king is struck by her beauty, and woose her "with unlawful love." The disastrous fate of her brother-condemned to death-forces her back to the court: her dishonour is the price of his life. Gonzalves, the Zanga of the piece, and who seeks to revenge on her lover the injuries a sister had sustained from Laval's father, reveals the secret she had confided to him under the seal of confession; and Françoise, overwhelmed with despair and shame. stabs herself.

There is much graceful poetry scattered through these pages, and we shall now make a miscellaneous collection of favourite passages. Tide of time.

" I do believe That at our feet the tide of time flows on That at our feet the tide of time flows on In strong and rapid course; nor is one current Or rippling eddy liker to the rest, Than is one age unto its predecessor: Men still are men, the stream is still a stream, Through every change of changeful tide and time; And 'tis, I fear, only our partial eye That lends a brighter sunbeam to the wave On which we launched our own adventurous bark."

Lover's return :--

He is returned! he will be there! and yet, 'He is returned! he will be there! and yet,
Though meeting after long eventful absence,
We shall not in our meeting be half blest;
A dizzy, whirling throng will be around us,
'Mid whose loud jar the still small voice of love,
Whose accents breathe their soft enchantment best
In whispered sighs, or but half-whispered words,
Will die unheard. Oh, that we thus should meet!
But, then, there is love's eye to flash his thought Into a language, whose rich eloquence Beggars all volce: our eyes at least may mest, And change, like messengers, the loving freight That either heart sends forth."

Family affection :-

amily affection:—
"Bourbon. I had thought, Margaret, that love for All ranks and all distinctions?
Margaret. Ay, so it doth. All ties, the world, its wealth, its fame, or fortune, Can twine; but never those of nature, Bourbon. So mine can give up all, save the first bond My heart e'er knew—the love of those who gave Life and the power to love—those early links Lie wreathed like close/knit fibres round my heart, Never to sever thence till my heart break."

Francis the First's appearance :-

"I passed him with his train,
The gathering crowd througing and clamouring
Around him, stunning him with benedictions,
And stifling him with love and fumes of garlick!
He, with the air he knows so well to don,
With cap in hand, and his thick chestnut hair With cap in hand, and his thick chestnut hair Panned from his forehead, bowing to his saddle, Smiling and nodding, cursing at them too For hindering his progress—while his eye, His eagle eye, well versed in such discernment, Roved through the crowd, and ever lighted where Some pretty ancle, clad in woollen hose, Peeped from beneath a short round petticoat, Or where some wealthy burgher's buxom dame, Decked out in all her high-day splendour, stood, Shewing her gossips the gold chain, which lay Cradled upon a bosom whiter far Than the pure lawn that kerchieft it.*

" There's a love which, born In early days, lives on through silent years,
Nor ever shines but in the hour of sorrow,
When it shews brightest—like the trembling light Of a pale sunbeam, breaking o'er the face Of the wild waters in their hour of warfare."

Death in battle, and on the scaffold :-

Death in battle, and on the scaffold:

"Hear me, thou hard of heart!
They who go forth to battle are led on
With sprightly trumpets and shrill clam'rous clarions;
The drum doth roll its double notes along,
Echoing the horses' tramp; and the sweet fife.
Runs through the yielding air in dulcet measure,
That makes the heart leap in its case of steel!
Thou shalt be knelled unto thy death by bells,
Pond'rous and brazen-tongued, whose sullen toll
Shall cleave thine aching brain, and on thy soul
Fall with a leaden weight; the muffled drum
Shall mutter round thy path like distant thunder;
Stead of the war-cry and wild battle-roar,
That swells upon the tide of victory,
And seems unto the conqueror's eager ear
Triumphant harmony of glorious discords!—
There shall be voices cry foul shame on thee,
And the infuriate populace shall clamour
To heaven for lightnings on thy rebel head!"

Afternoon:—

Afternoon:

"Bourbon. Ay, see the sun, that gorgeous conque
Upon the western gate of heaven doth halt.
Pescara. A conqueror call you him, Bourbon ?
Bourbon. Ay, marry.
Hath he not ridden forth, as though to battle,
Armed with ten thousand darts of living flame?
Hath he not, in his journey 'thwart the sky,
Encountered and o'ercome each gloomy cloud,
Each fog, or noisome vapour, that i' th' air
Hovered, like foul rebellion, to put out
His glorious light; and having conquered them,
Hath he not forced them don his livery—
The amber glow that all he looks on wears?
And now, behold, he stands on the last verge
Of his career, and looks back o'er his path,
Marked with a ruddy hue—how like a conqueror!
Now sinks he in that glowing mass of light
Which he hath fired; and look, Pescara, yonder
Comes on the night, who draws her sable vell
Over the whole; and this bright pageantry,
This gorgeous sunset, and this glorious sun,
Shall be forgotten in to-morrow's dawning!
So comes in death, and so oblivion falls
Over the mighty of the earth!"

We conclude with Gonzales' history of his sister's wrongs.

sister's wrongs.

"As fair a flower once grew within my home—
As young, as lovely, and as dearly loved.

I had a sister once, a gentle maid,
The only daughter of my father's house,
Round whom our ruder loves did all entwine,
As round the dearest treasure that we owned.
She was the centre of our soul's affections—
She was the bud that underneath our strong
And sheltering arms, spread over her, did blow.
So grew this fair, fair girl, till envious fate
Brought on the hour when she was withered.
Thy father, sir,—now mark! for 'tis the point
And moral of my tale—thy father, then,
Was by my sire in war ta'en prisoner.
Wounded almost to death, he brought him home
Sheltered him, cherishod him, and with a cara.

Most like a brother's, watched his bed of sickness, Till ruddy health once more through all his veins Sent life's warm stream in strong returning tide. How think ye he repaid my father's love 'From her dear home he lured my sister forth, And, having robbed her of her treasured honour, Cast her away, defiled, despoiled, forsaken! The daughter of a high and ancient line—The child of so much love! She died! she died! Upon the threshold of that home from which My father sourced her!—over whose nale corse My father spurned her !—over whose pale corse I swore to hunt through life her ravisher; Nor ever from my bloodhound track desist, Till due and deep atonement had been made Honour for honour given—blood for blood!

Before these remarks appear, public opinion will have pronounced on the dramatic capabilities of Francis the First; but no decision can alter the beauty of the above passages in reading. It is obvious many and great changes must have been made to fit it for scenic representation.

We have now only to offer the young and gifted author our cordial wishes for its most brilliant success.

Tour of a German Prince, &c. Vol. IV. London, 1832. E. Wilson.

OF Prince Puckler Muskau's fourth tome, which has just appeared in its English garb, we having said so much of its predecessors, shall this week say little. It is gossipy and amus-ing: e. g. Almack's (1827).

"The first Almack's ball took place this evening; and from all I had heard of this celebrated assembly, I was really curious to see it: but never were my expectations so disappointed. It was not much better than at Brighton. A large bare room, with a bad floor, and ropes around it, like the space in an Arab camp parted off for the horses; two or three small naked rooms at the side, in which were served the most wretched refreshments; and a company into which, spite of the immense difficulty of getting tickets, a great many 'nobodies' had wriggled; in which the dress was generally as tasteless as the tournure was bad - this was all. In a word, a sort of inn-entertainment; the music and the lighting the only good things. And yet Almack's is the culminating point of the English world of fashion. This overstrained simplicity had, however, originally a motive. People of real fashion wished to oppose something extremely cheap to the monstrous fasts of the rich parvenus; while the institution of lady-patronesses, without whose approbation no one could be admitted, would render it inaccessible to them. Money and bad company (in the aristocratical sense of the word) have, however, forced their way; and the only characteristic which has been retained is the unseemly place, which is not unlike the · local' of a shooting-ball in our large towns, and forms a most ludicrous contrast with the general splendour and luxury of England."

"After Almack's, there is no way of approaching an English lady so good as politics. There has been nothing to be heard lately, whether at dinner or at the opera, nay, even at balls, but Canning and Wellington from every pretty mouth; nay, Lord E—complained that his wife disturbed him with politics at night: she frightened him by suddenly calling out in her sleep, 'Will the premier stand or fall ?""

The Queen._" The Duchess of Clarence honoured the entertainment with her presence, and all pressed forward to see her; for she is one of the few princesses whose personal character inspires far more respect than their rank, and whose infinite goodness of heart and ami-to be queen of these realms."

The King, &c.—" I had the honour of dining with the Duke of Clarence to-day. The Princess Augusta, the Duchess of Kent, her daughter, and the Duchess of Glocester, were The duke is a very kind, friendly host, and always does me the favour to remind me of the various times and places at which we have met before. He has much of the true Englishman, in the best sense of the word, and the English love of domestic life. This dinner was given in celebration of the birthday of Princess Carolath. He gave her health; at which the gentle Emily, spite of her intimacy with the amiable duchess, her relation and friend, blushed over and over. Among the guests, I must mention Sir George Cockburn, who took Napoleon to St. Helena. He told me many circumstances, which proved Napoleon's extraordinary power of winning those whom he had any desire to win. The admiral likewise admired the sincerity with which Napoleon spoke of himself, as of an indifferent historical personage; and among other things, openly declared that the Russians had so completely outwitted him in Moscow, that up to the very last day he was continually in hope of peace, till at length it was too late. 'C'était sans doute une grande faute,' added he, coolly. The duke's daughters are d'un beau sang, all remarkably pretty, though all in a totally different siyle. Among the sons, the most dis-tinguished is Colonel Fitzclarence, whose travels overland from India, through Egypt, you read with so much interest. He has also written on the German Landwehr, of which he is no partisan. Seldom does one find a young officer of such varied accomplishments. I have known him a long time, and have frequently had occasion to be grateful for his obliging and friendly manners. His eldest sister is married to Sir Philip Sidney. I heard from her, that not only has the series of portraits been preserved unbroken in that illustrious family, from Lord Leicester's time downwards, but also a lock of hair of every successive head of the family. Among other curious documents, they have also a list of the guests at the feast at Kenilworth, and some very remarkable household accounts of that time. I believe Sir Walter Scott has used these papers.'

Anecdotes " This morning in the park I could not restrain a hearty laugh at a young lord, who has not profited much by his residence at Paris, and whose beautiful horse attracted more admiration than himself. 'Quel beau cheval que vous avez là!' said I. 'Oui,' replied he, with his English accent; " je l'ai fait moi-même, et pour celà je lui suis beau-coup attaché.' Is not this almost as good as the deaf Russian officer in Bthe king said, on the entrance of a sturgeon. 'Ce poisson là est bien fréquent chez vous.' 'Oui, sire,' replied he, with a profound how, je l'ai été pendant quinze ans.'

When we say that the first fifty pages furnish these, and as many more entertaining quotations, we hope we may be excused, as letter-writers say, "in haste," from doing more till next Saturday than introducing our lively caricaturist, yet often accurate foreign painter.

Mr. Jesse's Gleanings in Natural History. [Second Notice.]

WE turn again with great pleasure to this able disposition have gained her a popularity charming and instructive volume, which more in England of which we Germans may be than partakes of the spirit of White of Selproud; the more so as she is probably destined | bourne, and conveys the most pleasant emotions to the heart, while it amuses the mind and informs the head. We can well suppose the intelligent father of a family putting it, with great self-satisfaction, into the hands of his children, and opening to them so many new sources of study and gratification; teaching them to look at Nature in all her beautiful forms and contrivances, and consequently never to know what a tedious minute is. It is just the book to beguile the time with entertaining knowledge; curious and desultory, noticing a multitude of subjects, stating remarkable facts concerning them, and dwelling on nothing so long as to tire the idlest of readers or observers. We will select a few farther extracts to back our praise.

Animal Instinct.—" A strong proof of intellect was given in the case of Colonel O'Kelly's parrot. When the colonel and his parrot were at Brighton, the bird was asked to sing; he answered, 'I can't.' Another time he left off in the middle of a tune, and said, 'I have forgot.' Colonel O'Kelly continued the tune for a few notes; the parrot took it up where the colonel had left off. The parrot took up the bottom of a lady's pettionat, and said, 'What a pretty foot!' The parrot seeing the family at breakfast said, 'Won't you give some breakfast to Poll?' The company teazed and mopped him a good deal; he said, 'I don't like it. From a memorandum found amongst the late Earl of Guilford's papers.)"

Of the eel we are told—" The eel is evidently a link between the fish and serpent, but, unlike the former, it can exist a long time out of water, which its nocturnal migrations prove, though probably a certain degree of moisture on the grass is necessary to enable it to do this. That they do wander from one place to another is evident. . . I have (continues Mr. Jesse) been informed, upon the authority of a nobleman well known for his attachment to field-sports, that if an eel is found on land, its head is invariably turned towards the sea, for which it is always observed to make in the most direct line possible. If this information is correct (and there seems to be no reason to doubt it), it shows that the eel, like the swallow, is possessed of a strong migratory instinct. May we not suppose that the swallow, like the eel, performs its migrations in the same undeviating course?"

We can ourselves partly confirm this statement. for we have seen an eel more than twenty yards from a river, making its way to it like a snake through the grass of a moist meadow; and what is perhaps more uncommon, we have watched an eel rising repeatedly to the surface of a stream to bite off and feed upon the duckweed floating at the top. The eel, indeed, is altogether a singular object in natural history.

Mr. Jesse goes on to tell us :-

"An amazing number of eels are bred in the two large ponds in Richmond Park, which is sufficiently evident from the very great quantity of young ones which migrate from those ponds every year. The late respectable head-keeper of that park assured me, that, at nearly the same day in the month of May, vast numbers of young eels, about two inches in length, contrived to get through the pen-stock of the upper pond, and then through the channel which led into the lower pond, from whence they got through another pen-stock into a water-course which led them eventually into the river Thames. They migrated in one connected shoal, and in such prodigious numbers, that no guess could be given as to their probable amount. An annual migration of young eels also takes place in the river Thames in the month of May; and they have generally made their appearance at Kingston, in their way up-wards, about the second week in that month; and accident has so determined it, that, for several years together, it was remarked that the 10th of May was the day of what the fishermen call eel-fair; but they have been more irregular in their proceedings since the interruption of the lock at Teddington. young eels are about two inches in length, and they make their approach in one regular and undeviating column of about five inches in breadth, and as thick together as it is possible for them to be. As the procession generally lasts two or three days, and as they appear to move at the rate of nearly two miles and a half an hour, some idea may be formed of their enormous number. The line of march is almost universally confined to one bank of the river. and not on both sides at the same time; but, from some instinctive or capricious impulse, they will cross the river, and change the side without any apparent reason for doing so. When the column arrives at the entrance of a tributary stream which empties itself into the river, a certain portion of the column will continue to progress up the tributary stream, and the main phalanx either cross the river to the opposite bank, or will, after a stiff struggle to oppose the force of the tributary branch in its emptying process, cross the mouth of this estuary, and regain its original line of march on the same side of the river. In consequence of the young eels dispersing themselves from time to time, as occasion offers, in the manner above described, the shoal must imperceptibly lessen until the whole have disposed of themselves in different places. I have not yet been able to ascertain at what distance from Kingston the shoal has been seen. The locks at Hampton, Sunbury, &c., must, however, retard their progress upwards. These young eels are easily taken; and persons who want to stock their ponds with them have only to lower a bucket into the midst of the shoal, which many persons do who reside in the neighbourhood of the river, and a sufficient number is immediately taken to answer their purpose. There is no doubt but that many of these little animals perish during their progress; but the numbers which are annually taken in our rivers shew that a sufficient quantity escape to stock them abundantly. • • • Before (he adds) I quit this part of my subject, it may be as well to mention, for the benefit of all humane persons, that the most effectual and speedy method of killing an eel is by putting it into tepid water."

There is something striking in the subjoined remarks: — "I am not aware that any naturalist has noticed the circumstance, that those birds who are necessarily obliged to be a longer time absent from their nests in search of food for themselves or for their young, make infinitely warmer nests than those who are able to procure their food more readily. Thus we see the duck, and many aquatic birds who have a voracious appetite, and have often to go over a considerable space of ground in search of food, and are consequently a long time absent from their nest, cover up their eggs with a prodigious quantity of down and feathers, in order to prevent their eggs being chilled. In like manner, the long-tailed titmouse (Parus caudatus), who, having from twelve to fifteen young ones to provide for, must necessarily be a long time together away from them in search of food, so that she cannot herself impart the necessary warmth to birds do, not only lines her nest with a profusion of the softest feathers and down, but makes it almost in the shape of a ball, with a small hole in the side to enter at, so that the young are effectually protected from cold in their snug abode. The thrush, on the contrary, who can so readily procure worms on a lawn or in a meadow, so that it is not necessary for both the parent birds to be absent in search of food at the same time, lines its nest with clay or cowdung."

The following is also an interesting anecdote of gratitude and recollection shewn by an animal for human kindness.

"A young lady brought up a calf whose mother had died soon after it was born. She made a pet of it; but, when it became a heifer, for some reason it was parted with, and she lost sight of it for about two years. At the end of that time, as she was walking with a friend in a lane, she met some cows, when one of them the herd and came up to her, shewing evident symptoms of pleasure in seeing her. She immediately knew and patted her old acquaintance, who, after being satisfied by these marks of her favour that the recognition was mutual, quietly turned away and joined her companions."

Again, Mr. Jesse relates: " the following instance of affection in a bitch for her young was communicated to me by a friend of mine. an officer in the 15th Hussars. He had a favourite bull-bitch who had puppies, and think. ing as they grew older that they were making her too thin and weak, he took them from her, and shut them up in a sort of coop in a yard to which he thought she could not have access. She was seen, however, getting over the wall of the yard; and finding that her puppies could not get at her to suck her, she emptied the contents of her stomach into the place where her young were confined, and continued to do this two or three times a-day for some time. She had no difficulty in procuring as much food as she wanted, and conveyed it to her puppies in the manner mentioned. I have always considered this as one of the most curious instances I have met with of animal affection, and indeed of almost reason, as instinct alone would not have taught her this method of feeding her off-

"The only instance I have met with in which the hen bird has not the chief care in hatching and bringing up the young, is in the case of the emus at the farm belonging to the Zoological Society near Kingston. A pair of these birds have now five young ones; the female at different times dropped nine eggs in various places in the pen in which she was confined. These were collected in one place by the male, who rolled them gently and carefully along with his heak. He then sat upon them himself, and continued to do so with the utmost assiduity for nine weeks, during which time the female never took his place, nor was he ever were hatched, he alone took charge of them, and has continued to do so ever since, the female not appearing to notice them in any way. On reading this anecdote, many persons would suppose that the female emu was not possessed of that natural affection for its young which other birds have. In order to rescue it from this supposition, I will mention that a female emu belonging to the Duke of Devon-shire at Chiswick lately laid some eggs; and as there was no male bird, she collected them together herself and sat upon them."

cannot herself impart the necessary warmth to Ancedote. — "His present Majesty, when her brood by sitting on them as most other residing in Bushy Park, had a part of the foremast of the Victory, against which Lord Nelson was standing when he received his fatal wound, deposited in a small temple in the grounds of Bushy House, from which it was afterwards removed, and placed at the upper end of the dining-room, with a bust of Lord Nelson upon it. A large shot had passed completely through this part of the mast, and while it was in the temple a pair of robins had built their nest in the shot-hole, and reared a brood of young ones. It was impossible to witness this little occurrence without reflecting on the scene of blood, and strife of war, which had occurred to produce so saug and peaceable a retreat for a nest of harmless robins."

"I am (says our author) more inclined to think that some birds, and the robin amongst the number, vary the materials with which their nests are built, not so much from the difficulty of procuring them, as for the purpose of assimilating their nests more nearly to the anpearance of the objects which surround the situation in which they are built. I have observed this in a wren's nest, built in the thatch of a shed, and in another in a hay-rick, both of which had the external appearance of their nests different. I have also observed that, when a chaffinch has built its nest against the branch of some tree, the moss or lichens which compose the exterior part of the nest are simi-lar in appearance to those which are found on the tree itself; so that it is sometimes very difficult to perceive the nest. This fact is curious. as it shews a powerful instinctive foresight, and may account to an ingenious naturalist previously referred to, for his not having found two chaffinches' nests exactly alike amongst the twelve specimens in his collection."

There is probably some truth in this observation; but some of the facts may partly be accounted for by the builder's taking the material nearest and most ready for its purpose.

Captain Harkness on an Aboriginal Race inhabiting the Neilgherries. [Second notice: conclusion.]

In our last we alluded to the remarkable funeral ceremonies of the very original race of whom this volume treats; we now quote a description of them—the obsequies of a Tuda, named Kenbali, and one of the most aged of his tribe.

"A group of females arrived, attended by A group of tenales arrived, attended by two or three of their male relatives, carrying, folded up in a new mantle, the relics of the deceased. As the party slowly advanced, they each responsively chanted a solemn dirge, and each responsively claimed a solution right and the man-tle within the inner apartment, and seated themselves around it. Other groups of females soon afterwards arrived, and the whole joining in the lament, its swell now echoed through the valley, and seemingly told a tale of sorrew. Strolling up a path which led over one of the mountains, we were met, as we gained the summit, by the whole of the Kerzwan family and their connexions, men, weenen, and children, between sixty and seventy in number; all the former, excepting the aged, carrying huge clubs. The advance of the party was composed of twelve or fourteen athletic and handsome youths, shouting, as they came on, in sonorous and manly voices, the hauh, hauh, or cry of exultation, to which responses were given by the following groups. We were well known to this family; and after the usual salutations and inquiries, the section of youths composing the advance insisted on escorting us down the mountain's side, in the manner they had as-cended it in the opposite direction. We had,

however, proceeded but a short way, when the menced the dance. The remainder of the as- | and the cloth containing the relics. He then notes of the lament caught the ear of some one of the party, and gaining at the same time a view of the temple, the cry of exultation was quickly changed into a general response to the wailing and mourning below. As they approached the temple, the clubs were grounded, and as many entered as conveniently could at one time, bowing themselves to the relics; and after these had joined in grief for a brief space with the females and relatives within, they retired to make room for others. Some additional families, or companies of men and women, were now seen advancing to the spot, by the different winding paths along the sides of the mountains; and their deep responses, as each party topped some eminence, bringing them in view of the temple, or as they caught the notes of the death-song wafted on the breeze, gave a solemnity and seriousness to the scene, which rendered it extremely interesting. All these parties, as they approached the temple, went through the same ceremony as the first; and, in a short time several hundreds of both sexes • • Other small groups had also been formed in different parts of the valley, but all now returned to the green; and some forty or fifty of the clubmen, joining hand in hand, and circling round in measured time, performed a sort of dance, to the music of a pipe and tabor. This over, nearly the whole of the men proceeded a short distance up the valley, to the side of a mountain, on which were grazing a large herd of buffaloes, and selecting fifteen or sixteen of these, drove them with an air of triumph into the enclosed area; some of the men throwing off their mantles and entering it with them, and others leaping the walls, while the whole at the same time sent forth a shout of joyous exultation. Some of these animals, the intended victims of sacrifice, were the offerings of the family of the deceased, and some those of his connexions and friends. The same wild sort of dance as before mentioned now took place within the area, and among the buffaloes; and when the alarm and fury of the latter had been strongly excited, a signal was given to commence an attack upon them, and to attach a bell to the neck of each. Those which were provided by the family of the deceased were first selected. They were fine large animals, monsters in comparison to the breed of the low country, and in this infuriated state proved no informidable adversaries. No stratagem was had recourse to, but two of the young men throwing themselves upon the neck of the animal, seized it by the horns, and twist-ing their bodies behind the beast, supported themselves with one hand, while with the forefinger and thumb of the other they seized the cartilage of the nostrils. Others ran on to their assistance, when they let go the hold on the cartilage, and eight or nine of these powerful men were now seen hanging on the neck of one animal, while others were striking it with their clubs, and with hideous yells and gestures were endeavouring still to increase its rage, and to heighten the jeopardy of the party. During this time, the animal was not passive, but every now and then rushing as by a sudden impulse, sometimes among the other buffa-loss, sometimes against the wall of the enclosure, appeared often about to gain the victory over its numerous and powerful opponents. "Three or four animals were thus attacked and overpowered at the same time, and the bell being attached to the neck of each, they were again liberated, the successful combatants giving a shout of victory; when, shouldering their clubs, and joining hand in hand, they recomsemblage had in the meanwhile lined the walls of the area; of these, some were still weeping, some joining in the exultation of the successful combatants, and others, as the jeopardy of a husband or a lover became imminent, sent forth shricks of horror. The latter were not infrequent; and some gray-headed old men, who were looking on from the top of the wall, and in part directing the ceremonies, having remarked that in the days of their youth, two or three of them would overpower the largest and most furious of their animals, the combatants were excited to still further exertion, and several of them, in consequence, were severely wounded. The whole party then again returned to the green, and arranging themselves in several rows, a repast was served out, consisting of boiled rice and ghee; and the re mainder of the day passed, on the part of the relatives and connexions, in a continuance of the mourning; and on that of the others, in conversation, or in the dance. Great numbers of Burghers, Cohatars, and Curumbars, also attended this ceremony; and among the latter were the musicians, whose pipes, though it was difficult for our unpractised ears to catch the variations, gave forth the plaintive, the joyous, or the solemn, as on each occasion was judged suitable. Some among the former also offered victims of sacrifice; and as the example was too neighbourly not to be deserving of imitation, my friend and I each gave our victims also. During the repast, we had a good opportunity of ascertaining the number of the Tudas present, and found them to exceed what has been mentioned. All were dressed in their best attire; the hair of the women hanging over their shoulders, very tastefully curled, and their necks and wrists exhibiting a profusion of gold, silver, and coral ornaments, such as they are seldom or never seen to wear on common occasions. The superior bearing and masculine appearance of the men, the modest and graceful demeanour of the women. their fine expressive countenances, and, indeed the character of every thing connected with the seene passing before us, was so totally different from any thing else of the present day, either in this, or perhaps in any other part of the world, that it required no great force of imagination to suppose, that what we were witnessing, were relies of forms and ceremonies handed down traditionally through countless generations of a people who, except this poor remnant, have long since passed away. We were awakened the following morning by a lively air from the pipe and tabor. night had been rainy, and as shelter had only been provided for a few, many were obliged to seek it in the woods, where they had made large fires, the smoke of which was still curling up from among the trees, while those who had bivouacked around them were now returning to the green. After a very plentiful repast had been served out, the dance recommenced, both on the green and within the Tu-el; and as other victims, the voluntary offerings of friends, were occasionally brought in, they were in the same way attacked, and a bell tied to the neck of each. The folded mantle, containing the relics, was now brought from within the temple, and placed in a line east and west on the ground in front of the barricadoed entrance to the Tu-el. Immediately around it assembled the male relatives, the senior of whom, a grayheaded old man, crouched down, and covering his head with his mantle, bowed it to the rooted up some of the earth with a stick - the wand of the deceased - around which was now tied a shred from the cast-off garment of a Pol-aul; lifting then a little of this earth in the palm of his hand, and asking the consent of the by-standers, he threw some three times to the west, and three times to the east,-the former falling within the area, the latter on the relics. Recovering afterwards his erect position, he gave the stick to another, when the same ceremony was gone through by him, and in succession by all the other relations of the deceased, including two little boys, his great grandsons. The whole of the individuals, standing in front of the entrance to the area, now addressed the buffaloes as 'Dii Animales,' beseeching them to use their intercession for blessings to be bestowed on them, their wives, their children, and their herds; that they may enjoy health, and freedom from misfortune, that their feet may escape the thorn, their heads the falling rock. A young heifer was now led up and tied to one of four posts that were placed at a short distance, similarly situated to those in the cemetery before mentioned, when the sacrificer, first laying his hands on the head of the animal, slew it. The mantle containing the relics had in the meantime also been brought here. and when sprinkled with the blood which had trickled from the nestrils of the victim, it was removed to the centre of the green, and the female relatives and their friends seated themselves around it, repeating the lament, and shedding a profusion of tears. Among the relatives were two very old women, with perfectly silvered locks, one the wife, the other the sister of the deceased. Age had rendered them too infirm to walk, and they were carried to the spot, in the same way as they had been brought from their homes, on the shoulders of their sons. The general sacrifice now commenced. Some seven or eight of the victims were seized in the same manner as on the preceding day, and forced up to the relics, so near as to allow the dying breath of each to waft them as it passed; when two terallies, or men of the same class as the deceased, commenced the slaying of the animals. This operation was performed by striking the victim behind the horns with a wood-cutter's axe, a small instrument, but the first blow of which generally sufficed. The infuriated animal fell to the ground; its eyes, which but the moment before were rolling and glaring with rage, became on the instant glaxed and motionless. It was then dragged still closer to the mantle, so that the mouth and nostrils might rest on it. Some of the larger animals, however, did not so quietly submit to their fate, but whirling about the green, and driving in among the multitude, seemed at times to threaten destruction to their adversaries. Honour forbade that others should go to the assistance of the little band who had undertaken to master each animal, and thus, apparently, some chance was given to it; but it had to contend with the strong, whose energy and courage were not to be overcome. The sacrifice was continued till the whole of the victims were slain, and these, not including the heifer sacrificed at the posts, amounted to nineteen. They were all females, and one of the number had following it one of the beautiful calves already mentioned. It frisked after its mother, in all her evolutions, and when she was still, ran to her with apparent amazement. When she had fallen, it would not approach, ground so as to touch the earth with his fore-head, in the little space left between the Tu-el ance of the by-standers. This was not long required. A slight blow deprived it of life. and its mouth was then placed where, in life, it was fond to be, among the tests of its mother. The whole scene now presented an ex-tremely interesting spectacle. The wild dance, which, at a short distance, was still being performed by some of the party: the exultations of the clubmen, as they brought up another victim to the death; in the centre lay the relics, on each side of which sat weeping, in silence, the two silver-headed matrons; round these lay the slaughtered animals, and among them the crowd of mourners, males and females, young and old, sitting in pairs, face to face, 'with drooping foreheads meeting;' the whole uniting in one universal moan, with which, as it rose and fell, was heard the wailing pipe, breathing in unison the solemn notes of grief and sorrow. Others of the assembly joined the mourners; or two, who had previ ously associated their griefs, would part, and unite with others in the same expression. On these occasions, the ceremony of giving the foot was particularly remarkable. To a female sitting alone weeping, a man would go up, repeating the 'Hey hey ze zha!' or cry of sorrow, and projecting first one foot, then the other, the female would how down, so as to touch them with her forehead. If a female was the approaching party, she crouched down, and the man rising up, the same ceremony was observed. They then seated themselves opposite to one another, their foreheads touching, and sometimes their arms resting on each other's shoulders. This continued during about two hours, when the mourners gradually drew off, leaving only the few who were immediately about the relics. A little painted bow, three feathered arrows with bladed iron heads. and the wand of the deceased, were now laid on the mantle, a few handsful of parched grain and coarse sugar deposited between the folds of it, and the whole, after several prostrations, were again removed to the temple. A repast was then served out to the assembly; and a crowd of Cohatars, who till this period had kept at a respectful distance, crept in among the slaughtered animals, and busily engaged themselves in examining the state of their flesh, and the quality of their hides, seating themselves on those of which they intended to become the purchasers."

With this long quotation we must conclude, recommending Capt. Harkness's small volume to the general reader, as one replete with no-velty, information, and interest.

The Quadrature of the Circle discovered, &c. By Arthur Parsey. Pp. 24.

Mr. Parsey has not succeeded in finding the secret treasure, whatever Ali Baba might have done. He had better pursue his own vocation, and leave such abstruse questions to Archimedes and the Royal Society.

The Rent - Day: a Domestic Drama. Douglas Jerrold, author of the "Bride of Ludgate," &c. Second edition. London, 1832. C. Chapple.

WE have much pleasure in reading this very successful drama. A contemporary has much amused us by some singularly (we should rather say usually) silly declamation on the mischievous effects of Mr. Jerrold's drama. Where is the mischief of a simple and actual picture of daily occurring misery? That is a very sickly sensibility which shudders at real, and gives sympathy only to imaginary sorrows; and we hold that in the present day the distress band, in the brig Le Canaris. gives sympathy only to imaginary sorrows; and privation suffered by so large a portion of our fellow-creatures, cannot be too often or too strongly brought before our eyes. Original. pathetic, yet with much playful wit, together with an occasional rich vein of poetic imagery, we give Mr. Jerrold but his due when we consider him the most rising dramatist of the day.

Passages from the Diary of a late Physician. with Notes and Illustrations by the Editor. 2 vols. Edinburgh, 1832, W. Blackwood: London, T. Cadell.

WE do not wonder at the great popularity obtained by these papers, blending as they do at once novelty and reality. Sickness and the sorrows thereunto belonging come home to every heart; and the author now before us has a singularly graphic power of investing his fictions with life. Faults, and those of a young writer, there certainly are; the style is often florid, the descriptions too ornate, and there is a tendency to exaggeration : but there is at the same time a freshness and strength about these tales which at once attracts and fixes the attention. It is useless making extracts from pages which have been so widely circulated as these. which have already appeared in Blackwood's Magazine. We have only to state, that they now form two neat volumes, and are illustrated with some amusing notes.

Tales of the Saxons. By Emily Taylor. Pp. 234. London, 1832. Harvey and Darton.

A PRETTY little volume, well calculated to convey a considerable portion of information very pleasantly to juvenile readers.

Reports of the Commissioners on the Ecclesiastical Courts. 12mo. pp. 196. Longman and

ONE of those useful publications of parliamentary papers, in a convenient form, which all whom they may concern, and they concern almost every body, are glad to have for information and reference.

The Juvenile Philosopher. By T. Keyworth. 18mo. pp. 62. Relfe and Unwin.

A LEAF out of Philosophy in Sport, on the steam-engine, orrery, and two or three other matters of interest to the young. Its chief merit is, that the Juvenile Philosophers whom it addresses, may, with a little ingenuity, construct their own apparatus, and conduct their own experiments.

The Nautical Magazine, No. I. THE frontispiece is a curious print of Captain T. Dickinson's method of recovering the treasure from the wreck of the Thetis. Several papers of great utility to seamen constitute the body of the publication. From the more brief miscellanies, mentioning new improvements, laying down of buoys, discoveries of perils in navigation, &c. we learn that the volcanic island on the coast of Sicily has sunk some feet beneath the surface of the sea, and has become a dangerous shoal. Lieut. Kennedy, in H. M. steam-vessel Messenger, passed it on the 4th and 5th of February. He lays it down in lat. 37° 11' N., and long. 12° 44' E.

We also gather from the same source, that the Danish Captain Graah has returned to Copenhagen, from his second voyage along the coast of Greenland, having made some interesting discoveries. The Geographical Society of Paris have presented him with their gold medal; and the Royal Antiquarian Society of Denmark has directed an annual sum to be appropriated to those who have already or may hereafter find any ruins in that country.

Illustrations of American Ornithologu. No. II. Spooner.

REDUCED from Wilson's celebrated work, this is a continuation of the beautifully pencilled and coloured birds of America. No fewer than twenty-one subjects are contained in this little part: they are extremely natural and brilliant.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

BRITISH ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCE. MENT OF SCIENCE.

ONE of the first objects of this Association has been to supply that great desideratum in our scientific literature, so long felt and lamented by our philosophers—the publication of annual reports on the state and progress of the different branches of science, similar to those which have for many years reflected honour on the scientific establishments of foreign countries, especially the Royal Academies of Paris. Stockholm. Berlin, and Göttingen. From the first report of the British Association, it appears that the following gentlemen have undertaken to present reports at the next meeting at Oxford, on the 18th of June: the Rev. G. Peacock, on the recent progress of mathematical analysis, in reference particularly to the differential and integral calculus; Prof. Airy, on the state and progress of astronomical science, in reference particularly to physical astronomy; Mr. Lubbock, on the data and desiderata for calculating the time and height of high water; Mr. D. Forbes, on the present state of meteorological science; Sir D. Brewster, on the progress of optical science; the Rev. R. Willis, on the phenomena of sound; Professor Powell, on the phenomena of heat: Professor Cumming, on thermo-electricity; Mr. J. F. Johnson, on the recent progress of chemical science; Professor Whewell, on the state and progress of mineralogical science: Mr. R. Stevenson, on the waste and extension of the land on the east coast of Britain, and on the relative level of the sea and land; Professor Lindley, on the principal questions connected with the philosophy of botany.

Another object of the committee has been, to recommend the prosecution of researches in different branches of science, and especially in reference to those points of inquiry on which uncertainty prevails. The following researches have already been undertaken: Mr. G. Harvey, an hourly register of the thermometer at Plymouth; Earl of Minto, illustration of the law of the decrease of temperature with increasing elevations in the atmosphere, by a continuation of experiments with balloons; Messrs. W. Gray, jun. and J. Phillips, observations on the comparative quantities of rain falling on the top of York Minster and near its base; Dr. Traill, observations on the intensity of terrestrial magnetism: Mr. W. Henwood, observations on the electro-magnetic condition of metalliferous veins; Drs. Prout and Turner, a revision of some of the primary data of chemistry; Professor Daubeny, researches in analytical chemistry; Mr. J. F. Johnson, analysis of specimens of iron in different stages of its manufacture, as transmitted from the principal iron-works in Yorkshire; the Rev. W. D. Conybeare and Professor Sedgwick, the inquiry respecting parallelism in the lines of disturbance of the British strata; Professor Henslow, contributions to the Flora Cantabrigiensis; the sub-curator of the Yorkshire Philosophical Society, a sys-|rotation which he (Mr. F.) discovered many|suits of ladies' clothes, have been made. tematic catalogue of the native plants of the years ago; that the motion of the magnet is county of York.

Among the recommendations urged, we may notice that of the co-operation on the part of Societies established in different districts with the general Association, and that of comparisons of instruments of observation with a given standard. The objects particularly contemplated by the Association are, to obtain a clear and common understanding on unsettled questions of general interest; to fix the data on which important points of theory hinge; and to col-lect and connect extensive series of observations. One peculiar feature in the principles of the Association is, that it claims no right of property in the papers which it receives. Its objects are intended not to interfere with those of any of our existing national establishments, but to undertake those labours in promoting the progress of scientific discovery which have been hitherto neglected, and, by extensive cooperation and union, to render virtual and effective the division of labour in science, which, for want of such intercommunication, has retarded the steady advancement of science in this country. In the proceedings of the general meeting, the address, delivered by the Rev. W. V. Harcourt, on the objects and plan of the Association, is distinguished for its comprehensive and philosophical views, and for the eloquence and vigour of its composition. He defines the general objects contemplated by the Institution as being, to give a stronger impulse and more systematic direction to scientific inquiry; to obtain a greater degree of national attention to the objects of science, and a removal of those disadvantages which impede its progress; and to promote the intercourse of the cultivators of science with one another and with foreign philosophers. Among the other addresses are those of Lord Morpeth, Sir D. Brewster, and Mr. Murchison. The report concludes with Dr. Henry's estimate of Dr. Priestley's philosophical character, and abstracts of the other communications read at the first assembly.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.

THE extraordinary phenomenon discovered by M. Arago, six or seven years ago, of the mu-tual action of metals and magnets when relatively in motion, which he considers either as unexplained or dependent upon a new property of matter, was taken up by Mr. Faraday, for the purpose of applying to it what he considers a full and satisfactory explanation, derived from his recent discoveries in magneto-electric induction. In our No. for the 25th ultimo, we reported the general principles of magnetoelectric induction, and the way in which when any metal is moving by a magnetic pole, an electric current is formed, or tends to form, across the path of the metal. In one form of M. Arago's experiment a horizontal copperplate is made to revolve under a powerful horseshoe magnet, hung by strings over and near the plate, but with a screen intervening to prevent any effects from the motion of the air. This experiment, among many others, Mr. Faraday shewed, and the revolution of the magnet was very striking. He then, without altering the arrangement further than to confine the magnet so that it should not revolve, applied conductors to the axis and edge of the revolving copper-plate, and drew off a current of electricity from it, which was conveyed by wires away to a distant galvanometer, and there powerfully deflected the needle. Mr. Faraday stated, that, in fact, Arago's phenomenon into twenty or thirty laminæ, white and fine like always consistent with the direction of the induced current; and, finally, that the theory and the facts are in perfect agreement. Referring to the differences observed by MM. Arago, Herschel, Babbage, Harris, &c., in the action of different metals, when revolving, upon the magnet, and which at first presented a difficulty, Mr. Faraday stated that he had by late experiments been able entirely to remove it, and by using a double galvanometer, (which was then upon the table,) he had succeeded in ascertaining, that when magnets acted by induction upon different metals, the currents produced in them varied with their conducting power. The following is the order of five metals thus investigated - copper, zinc, iron, tin, and lead; copper giving the most powerful electric current, lead the least, and all the differences depending on conducting power. So strong was this impression on his mind, that Mr. Faraday expressed his full conviction, that where substances not conductors of electricity had been supposed to be affected by the magnet, the cause of motion would turn out to be accidental, or, as in iron and similar metals, due to pure ordinary magnetic action. It has been usually supposed that in Arago's experiment, the copper, or other metal, was acted upon in a transient and feeble manner, like iron and the true magnetic metals; but a distinct proof that that is not the case, was given, and it is so general as to apply as a test to the investigation of the course of motion under similar circumstances in all other bodies. It was drawn from a comparison of the received view with that given by Mr. Faraday on the present occasion, - the two under certain conditions producing directly opposite results. If similar plates of iron and copper be suspended freely, and then a north magnetic pole carried round under the edge of each, they will revolve, following the motion of the pole. If a similar pole be placed above the edge of the plates, but corresponding to the lower one, and both moved round together, the effect on the iron will be doubled, or more; but with the copper, on the contrary, the effect will be neutralised, and it now will not move with the magnets. If a north pole be on the one side, and a south pole on the other, then the effect on the copper is doubled, and that on the iron is neutralised, the latter metal becoming quite indifferent to the magnet.

The meeting was very numerously attended; and in the library were placed a variety of interesting productions in nature and the arts.

At the last meeting, Mr. Foggo delivered some observations on the causes of the superiority of ancient Grecian art; after which Mr. Faraday exhibited a working model of the apparatus used at some of the hospitals in Paris to obtain nutriment from bones.

LINNÆAN SOCIETY.

A. B. LAMBERT, Esq. in the chair. — A continuation of Mr. Ogilby's paper on marsupial animals was read. Mr. Ward, F.L.S., exhibited a portion of the trunk of the lace-bark tree of Jamaica, (Lagetta lintearia of Jussieu), the curious texture of whose inner bark resembles the finest Brussels lace. Sir Joseph Banks and Dr. Solander considered it a species of Daphne; but it has since been determined to be a new genus. The tree grows on the high rocky hills in Jamaica to the height of 20 feet; the bark is thick, and may be separated is merely another form of the electro-magnetic gauze: of this, caps, ruffles, and even whole usual materials.

the meeting on Tuesday evening there was read a Descriptive Catalogue of the Composite contained in the Herbarium of Dr. Gillies, by Mr. David Don, Libr. L.S. This is the second of a series of memoirs which it is the intention of the author (whose profound knowledge of this class is well known) to give on the Composite of the South American Flora. The species described in the present paper were col-lected chiefly by Dr. Gillies on both sides of the Chilian Andes, which afford a Flora of the most rich and varied character. The author gave some interesting observations on the geographical distribution of this class of plants, and showed (as has been observed in the animal) that in the vegetable kingdom particular regions are appropriated as a sort of head-quarters for different families.

MR. BERRY'S PATENT LIGHTS, &c.

WE have more than once spoken of the most ingenious methods with which Mr. Berry has applied his several useful inventions to the improvement of articles of constant necessity, such as inkstands, smelling-bottles, instantaneous lights, &c. &c. By the employment of caoutchouc in stopping the bottles, he had obtained as certain and impermeable a means as the hermetic seal itself; but he has since, by contriving springs to yield under the pressure of the stopper, and other curious though simple expedients, added yet more to the neatness, beauty, and perfection of his productions. Of this we have an admirable example now before us. It consists of a handsome bronze candlestick," in the stem of which is fitted the apparatus for lighting the candle; i. e. the igniting bottle and matches. The stem is taken off and put on with the utmost ease, like the bayonet to a gun: there is not the slightest trouble, and all the materials are together in a small and appropriate compass. The design altogether is extremely pretty; — cause and effect in the mechanical world is as convenient, though, perhaps, not so elevated as in the moral world. We advise our friends to look at Mr. Berry's enlightened candlesticks.

LITERARY AND LEARNED. ROYAL SOCIETY.

DAVIES GILBERT, Esq., succeeded by J. W. Lubbock, Esq., in the chair.—An additional notice of the volcanic island, by Dr. John Davy, was read. The author's account of this island in his former communication extended to the 25th of October; and this supplementary notice contains his observations to the time of its final disappearance at the end of December last. In July the atmosphere at Malta is described by him as having been exceedingly close and oppressive, and its temperature unusually high; and in August the western sky to have exhibited a most lurid and threatening aspect, to the great alarm of the inhabitants, who regarded these atmospheric appearances as indicative of some great impending calamity. He states the successive changes which have taken place in the volcanic island since its elevation to have been very imperfectly observed; but he considers the knowledge of these changes to be unimportant. Having described some of the mineralogical specimens thrown up, he remarks, that the island disappeared during the continuance of violent squalls and a heavy sea; and considers this circumstance to be favourable to the supposition, that it was forced up from a deep sea, and not elevated by a shoal. | minds of those who had the pleasure to hear But the valuable and sterling data, and accurate local information, which Captain Smyth's long residence on that naval station, while executing the Admiralty survey of the Mediterranean, enabled him to supply in his late communication to the Royal Society, afford to ourselves almost conclusive evidence on this point. A paper was communicated by Sir Edward Cod. rington on a mode of determining the longitude at sea from the observation of the moon's right ascension, by Thomas Kerizan, R.N. The author details in this communication the advantages which this method offers, in comparison with that of lunars as usually employed, and states the peculiar circumstances under which the latter method is impracticable. He gives examples of the proposed mode of determination, and considers that, with the aid of a chronometer shewing the approximate mean time at Greenwich, the longitude of any given place may be determined within very narrow limits, and within the chance of only a small error.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.

MR. HUDSON GURNEY in the chair. The reading of Mr. Madden's paper was continued.

THE LITERARY FUND.

THE annual meeting for the election of officers, auditing the accounts, &c. took place on Wednesday, at the Society's chambers in Lin-coln's Inn Fields. The Duke of Somerset was re-elected President; and the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Mulgrave, the Earl of Munster, Sir John Swinburne, Sir John Scane, and Andrew Spottiswoode, Esq., Vice-Presidents, in the room of a like number of noblemen and gentlemen either lost to the Society by death, or rendered ineligible to continue in office by the provisions of the charter. In the council no alterations were necessary; but to the general committee, to which is intrusted the distribution of the fund, the names of E. L. Bulwer, Esq. M.P., G. Dollond, Esq., and John Murray, jun. Esq., were added, to supply vacancies which had occurred during the past year. Mr. Hope, one of the auditors, read the finance report, from which it appeared that the receipts of the year 1831 amounted to 2,9851. 3s. 2d.; that sixty cases of literary distress had been relieved, at the expenditure of 945%; and that after the payment of rent, salaries, and incidental expenses, the balance in the hands of the treasurers was 1,514l. 8s. 9d. This large surplus arose principally from the receipt of a legacy of 1000%., left by Andrew Strahan, Esq., and another legacy left by the late Mr. Bulmer, printer; which enabled the Society to fund 1200% in the three per cents, besides liberally providing for all the claims of the unfortunate which had been brought before the committee. This gratifying report was received, and agreed to by acclamation. Some suggestions for improvements in two or three of the by-laws were offered by Messrs. Woodfall, Griffin, Foss, Jerdan, &c.; and left for future consideration. A general committee was then formed; and cases of distress relieved in that secret manner. so becoming in an institution of this kind. The club afterwards dined at Freemasons Tavern, where, in the course of the evening, other hints, of much value to the charity, were as usual, thrown out, and adopted to be acted The members had to regret the unavoidable absence of their chairman, Sir J. C. Hobhouse, whose presidence at the preceding meeting had displayed so much feeling and

PINE ARTS.

BRITISH GALLERY.

[Sixth notice: conclusion.]

No. 526. Cottage with Figures. F. R. Lee. A perfect gem of art.

No. 530. Frogmill, Salop. W. R. Earl. A singularly fine combination of picturesque forms; of which Mr. Earl has availed himself with a skill which gives an air of great originality to his performance.

No. 545. Fishermen's Children. A Fraser. We have seldom seen fish and flesh better brought together.

No. 567. The old Fort Rouge, off Calais. W. Davison.—A scene of tempestuous grandeur, treated in a broad bold style of art.

No. 575. The Winding-sheet. J. Stewart. Would not a gloomy old woman have been more appropriate than a gay young one? The picture is, however, well painted.

No. 576. Maternal Affection. J. Green.

As pleasing to the eye as the feeling which it depicts is pleasing to the heart.

No. 583. A Vase of Flowers from Nature. Mrs. Stannard. - To the curious and wellexecuted details of this performance, the rarer qualities of good taste and artist-like composition are added.

No. 582. Hampshire Fisherman. J. Inskipp. A picture that defies situation: its light and effect would hardly in any place be lost. Not so No. 584, Landscape and Cattle, W. Shayer; the picturesque character and fine finishing of which are, we are sorry to observe, nearly hid from view.

Besides the works in the landscape-department which we have noticed, there are in this room several others highly attractive. Among them are, No. 529. Scene at Sunmer-hill, Kent, C. T. Dodd; No. 531. Landscape, Composition, A. Clint; No. 554. Retirement, Evening, G. Barrett; No. 557. Distant View of Edinburgh, A. Nasmyth; No. 558. St. Michael's Mount, H. W. Burgess (a new and striking view of this extraordinary spot); No. 568. A Mill at Leewood's Bridestow, Lewis; No. 570. Old Buildings near Canterbury, C. Deane (highly interesting from their picturesque form and character); &c. &c. &c.

SCULPTURE.

The few novelties in this department of art will be found principally in the small models, and in those subjects from familiar life which we think might with advantage be transferred to canvass; especially Nos. 589 and 594. Old Mortality, and Dumbiedikes, by E. Cotterill; No. 592. The Sportsman reposing; and No. 596. The Gallant, also by Mr. Cotterill, are clever examples in the same style. No. 593. An Equestrian Statue of his late Royal High-ness the Duke of York, V. Gahagan, is, both in feature and in figure, an admirable resemblance of his royal highness: we cannot praise the nag. No. 590. Hawking Party, V. Gahagan, an elegant and interesting group, would also paint well. No. 595. Affection, W. F. Woodington, is well expressed, and belongs to the more simple and dignified class of sculp-

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Finden's Landscape Illustrations to Murray's complete Edition of Byron. Part II. J. similar visit to amateurs. Murray; C. Tilt.

A CHARMING vignette of Constantinople; a ability, and left a strong impression upon the view of Corfu, the picturesque Franciscan Convent at Athens, Lisbon, and the Tagus, so likely to be soon the scene of other scenes than accord with its sweet repose in this plate; the temple of Jupiter Olympius at Athens, and a superb portrait of Ali Pasha, make the contents of this equally fine and interesting Part. Finden's talents were never employed on a happier choice of subjects, and he has done them ample iustice.

Juliet. Painted by Miss S. Sharpe; engraved by J. Bromley. Moon, Boys, and Co. This is a lovely conception of the natural and impassioned Italian maid; and Mr. Bromley has bestowed his best skill in transferring Mist Sharpe's beautiful idea to the burin. The whole is simple, sweet, and touching.

Lord A. G. Russell on his Pong Emerald. E. Landseer, R.A. On stone by R. J. Lane, A.R.A. J. Dickinson.

THE lithographic art has not produced a more spirited design, or one more ably executed than this. It may be received as a perfect example of what can be accomplished in that style. The pony is inimitable; and the scampering of the goat and kids imparts a liveliness to the scene which is quite delightful.

1. For Away; 2. Arrived in Sight. On stone by W. Sharp, from an original by Mrs. H. Browne. R. Ackermann, London. THE thirteenth part of Mr. Baines's able work is rendered peculiarly interesting by a very characteristic portrait of the late William Roscoe, Esq. engraved from a picture by Mr. Lonsdale.

DRAWINGS.

Colonel Batty's Drawings. - The original drawings of Colonel Batty's German scenery, we observe, are about to be sold at Phillippe's, and we believe they are the first specimens of this officer's skill of which collectors have had the opportunity of possessing themselves.

Mr. Turner's Drawings.— We have been gratified by inspecting, at Messrs. Moon, Boys, and Graves, a collection of the drawings made by Mr. Turner, to be engraved for the new edition of Scott's poems. Of these masterly productions there are twelve finished (the whole number being twenty-four, or a plate and vignette for each of the twelve volumes); and we have not seen more spirited or captivating performances even from Mr. Turner's pencil-Among the full subjects are Kelso Bridge, Carlaverock Castle, Jedburgh, Dryburgh Abbey, &c.; and among the vignettes, Smailholm Tower, Bemerside, Lochmaben, and other very fine and interesting subjects. ORIGINAL POETRY.

CHRIST BLESSING LITTLE CHILDREN.

(Wa have the pleasure to lay before our readers a specimen poem from The Raster Gift, by L. E. L.; this volume being the first from her pen of the class of religious composition— unpublished—and consequently possessed of greater public interest. The poems illustrate a number of beautiful engravings, and are truly eligible for this season of a nation's humiliation and nentiere. Penitence.]

IF ever in the human heart A fitting season there can be, Worthy of its immortal part, Worthy, O blessed Lord, of thee;

'Tis in that yet unsullied hour, Or ere the world has claimed its own: Pure as the hues within the flower, To summer and the sun unknown;

When still the youthful spirit bears The image of its God within, And uneffaced that beauty wears, So soon to be destroyed by sin.

Then is the time for Faith and Love To take in charge their precious care, Teach the young eye to look above, Teach the young knee to bead in prayer.

This work is ours ... this charge was thine These youthful souls from sin to save; To lead them in thy faith divine, And teach its triumph o'er the grave.

The world will come with care and crime, And tempt too many a heart astray: Still the seed sown in early time Will not be wholly cast away.

The infant prayer, the infant hymn Within the darkened soul will rise, When age's weary eye is dim, And the grave's shadow round us lies;

The infant hymn is heard again, The infant prayer is breathed once more; Reclasping of a broken chain, We turn to all we loved before.

Lord, grant our hearts be so inclined, Thy work to seek - thy will to do; And while we teach the youthful mind Our own be taught thy lessons too.

A pretty Boy. One of the march-of-intellect boys, who are now so rife at early age in our public schools, was showing off, as usual, by asking instead of answering questions. The lesson was geography; and he nonphused his tuter by inquiring, in the most simpering man-ner of modesty, "Pray, sir! are there not some savage nations who wear ear-rings in their noses ?"

MUSIC.

LENT CONCERTS: DRURY LANE.

THE first of the Lent musical performances, on Friday, the 9th, was not so numerously attended as it deserved to be. Besides many other, Mozart's "Splendente te, Deus," were very effectively performed. The choruses in these went with so much precision, that we are inclined to think some portions of Haydn's and Mozart's masses might occasionally be introduced, and performed in a manner to render them bighly attractive. Mrs. Bishop sang much better than on a similar occasion about six weeks ago. There is so much real excellence in her style, that her defective intonation is matter of considerable regret. It is to be hoped a little care will enable her to correct this fault, which so much diminishes the pleasure her singing would otherwise impart. Mrs. Wood displayed much clever execution, together with a certain quantity of trickery, soaring above the vulgar distinctions of time and measure, which ordinary musicians think it necessary to observe. Nor do we admire the guttural tone she has acquired; it is not only disagreeable in itself, but it destroys all clearness of articulation. Mr. Templeton was much applauded in both his songs, and, in some respects, deservedly so; but, owing probably to timidity, he is generally a little too flat. That clever urchin, Master Cooper, played a concerto on the violin with great skill and precision. An old duet by Travers, "I, my dear, was born Phillips, without accompaniment. But the greatest treat of the evening was "Alexis," sung by Braham and accompanied by Lindley. It is impossible to imagine any thing more delightful than the pure tone, exact intonation, and identity of feeling which pervaded its performance. Singer and accompanist seemed equally bent on giving effect to the music rather than on individual display. This is as it should be. The symphonies to "Alexis" afford a fine opportunity for the exercise of Lindley's powera. The bare recollection of his exquisite playing is a high gratification.

The "grand performance of ancient and modern music" at this theatre on Wednesday, was, according to the custom of several past seasons, extremely bisarre in its selection and arrangement. Songs serious and comic, anthems and glees, opera and oratorio choruses, formed the mélange of the evening. greater part of the music was, however, of the first order, and some of it very well performed. Among the best efforts were Handel's "Lascia Amor," by Phillips; Weber's "Oh, 'tis a Almon," by Philips; Weber's "Oh, 'tis a glorious sight," Neukomm's "O, Absalom," and the "Death of Nelson," by Braham; "Blow, blow, thou winter's wind," by Templeton; a duet, "All' Idea," by De Begnis and Braham; and a terzetto ("Pappataci") by De Begnis, Seguin, and T. Cooke. Handel's "Let me wander not unseen," and a new Swigs sir ware delightfully and New York. Swiss air, were delightfully sung by Madame Stockhausen, and most deservedly encored. The chief novelty of the concert was the performance of some variations on the violin by "Master Viotti Collins, son of the celebrated English Paganini," a child apparently not more than ten years old: they were executed with much precision and spirit, and loudly applauded. The band is very good; but the chorus-singers are far too few in number to do justice to Handel, Haydn, or Rossini.

DRAMA.

KING'S THEATRE.

SATURDAY .- Pietro l'Ermita was well cast, and the house well attended. Madame Puzzi made her first appearance this season as Aggia; other classical productions, two noble motetts, and although we cannot congratulate her on one, Haydn's "Insanze et vanze Curze," the any improvement either in voice or style, still she sang with sweetness. Meric improves nightly, and as we become accustomed to her bell-like voice, we are more and more pleased. Winter wanted energy;—the concerted pieces towards the end of the opera were well sung, though we cannot say as much for those at the beginning. Giubelei made but an indifferent Pietro.

COVENT GARDEN.

HAVING reviewed the tragedy of Francis I. in the proper place, we have great pleasure in stating, that on its first representation on Thursday, the house was crammed and the success complete. At this late period of the week we shall abstain from more particular remark.

ADELPHI.

WE are disposed to deem it a monopoly that two individuals, each with the power of Legion, and able to make themselves many, should exhibit their extraordinary talents at the same theatre. Yet so it is. Here we have Yates on the lenten days of Wednesday and Friday as much "at home" as if there were no Mathews to be "at home" too, whenever their arrangements made it expedient. We went to the opening on Friday, and were much enter-tained. In two acts Yates displays infinite humour and almost ultra-infinite versatility. Song, patter, anecdote, jest, personations, (several of the latter of the highest character in art,) contribute to render his performance as various and amusing as it is extraordinary. Tableaux, a very clever ballet, (which some of the audience did not please to be pleased with, though one of the best things of the kind we ever saw,) and some indifferent phantasma-goria, filled up the half-dozen of hours,—short of which, it is said, nobody will be satisfied with an evening's dramatic efforts. We cannot decide this knotty point; but sure we are, that Yates's own exhibition was quite enough to please any rational play-goer; and we farther opine, that more people (especially families) are kept from theatres by the dread and fatigue of prolonged hours, than are tempted thither by a multiplication of pseudo attractions.

OLYMPIC.

MR. POOLE's drama of the Young Hopefuls was brought out here on Thursday. It is founded on the adventures of the pages of Frederick of Prussia, which are already familiar to the stage. Mr. Poole has, however, given a new version of the affair, and, with his pretty pages, done by females, including Vestris, Miss Crawford, &c. &c., and with Liston in a noodle German baron, succeeded in winning the applause of the audience.

STRAND THEATRE.

Alp the Brigand. We wish the proprietors of this theatre would confine themselves to vaudevilles and light amusing farces, and not attempt such rubbish as the above-named piece: and moreover, we would recommend Mademoiselle Celeste to preserve at least a semblance of decency in her dress. She out-herods the most exposed of the opera-dancers; and if she must wear male attire, at any rate we would request she would lengthen her tunic. Her dress and dancing as a Greek boy is a disgusting exhibition.

UNREHEARSED STAGE EFFECTS.

Adelphi, March 9.—Yates (first night of his Monopolylogue) gave us the following droll accident.

misreading while delivering a speech from the Merchant of Venice: it is as whimsical as any of his purposed jokes,

O upright Jew! Mark judge! O learned Jew!

In the phantasmagoria with which the entertainment concludes, we were treated with the following written specimen of an "unknown tongue," in large capitals, surmounting the portraits of the King and Queen,

MAHT SSELB DOG.

This inscription was, doubtless, right to him who writ it; but it should either have been left (or not have been left) to him, and then it might have been right to the audience. It is, I presume, still to be seen "on Wednesdays and Fridays during Lent."

King's Theatre, March 10 .- First night of Pietro l'Eremita. Pietro having invoked the vengeance of Heaven on his foes, was answered from above by a signal for showers of fire to pour upon them. The sound of said signal was carcely sufficiently awful for the occasion, it being nought but the tinkle-tinkle of the sceneshifter's bell. In the last scene, the Sultan's son, in attempting to slay Pietro, should be stricken by a thunderbolt, and fall dead; but on this occasion he made the attack, and fell, nobody knew why: the squib, however, that shortly after came fizzing down, about a couple of yards from him, gave some clue to what was meant. This last part was but fair, as it would have been very cowardly on the part of the thunderbolt to have struck him after he was down. Four soldiers lifted him up to carry him out; but, alas! the oblique string, one end of which was fastened to the stage, obstructed their passage, and threatened to knock off their caps if they persisted; so that, after many futile endeavours to pass the cordon, they again laid Signor Winter on the stage. Hereon a desperate and portly carpenter, thinking himself invisible, rushed on, and skulking behind the Sultan's throne, tugged away at the thunderbolt-string till the desired end was more effectually than effectively accomplished; and the four attendants, once more gathering up the Signor's legs and arms, car-There ried him out without further mishaps. is a chamber-door in La Somnambule, which, as nobody can ever open, every body always enters and exits, with the utmost sang froid, through the wall at the side of it.

Strand Theatre. March 12 .- Mademoiselle Celeste, as the dumb brigand (in the piece so named), being called for at the close of the curtain, spoke as follows: "Lartis an Shentymins, wizzure permeesione dissa pessa sal be rippit."

Coburg, March 12 .- From the Strand Theatre I journeyed hither, where Paul Clifford was being enacted for the first time, and saw Davidge and Webster in a scene meant for a ball at Bath, in its time of supreme ton and etiquette, dancing cotillons with their hats on! Mr. Gray, in the last act, ventured the desperate experiment of acting a high tragedy scene with a judge's wig on! His hands were ever and anon upon his pate, in a manner alike expressive of hopeless anxiety to keep his son in existence, his plans of ambition in train, and his capacious and unruly head-gear on his In the after-piece of Don Juan a ship should be annihilated by a thunderbolt; but on such occasions an effect is always nobly independent of its cause. Down goes the ship unstruck - down comes the thunderbolt unstriking. This one must have been taking striking. This one must have been taking lessons of the Opera thunderbolt. It is generally my fate to see the double of an absurd accident.

* It seems easier to write than pronounce this name. It was on this occasion pronounced in the following eight styles: Eugene Ayram—Eugene Ayram—Eug

Queen's Theatre, March 13. When Eugene Arame (in the drama of that name) died, his black vest, bursting from the companionship of his trunks of the same colour, revealed a large portion of a garment of the exactly contrary colour! So fine was the perception of the corpse, that it was immediately sensible of the mishap, and quickly passing its lifeless hand athwart itself, seized hold of its cloak, wherewith, with a decency in death worthy of Casar, it strove to hide, not quite successfully, the but too capacious aperture, by holding it before the same till the fall of the curtain. The great black seams in the gauze, behind which the illustrations of passages from Shakspeare are exhibited, are themselves illustrations of passages from Shakspeare; for they pass "athwart men's noses -o'er courtiers' knees -o'er lawyers' fingers—o'er ladies' lips—o'er soldiers' throats," &c. &c. The Hamlet can no longer say, "I know not seams."

"Out on your seaming! I will write against it."

Much ado about Nothing:

The pedestal of Hermione's statue was supported behind by two legs in red plush breeks. As there is no allusion to such ornaments in any part of the Winter Tale, I think I may class their appearance a long unrehearsed stage effects.

VARIETIES.

Oriental Literature. - M. Edouard de Cadavène, who has been detained for nearly three years in the East by a scientific mission, has recently arrived at Paris. After having traversed Greece, and ascended the Nile to the fifth cataract, this traveller visited Syria and Asia Minor; and a publication which he is about to issue, promises a variety of interesting documents respecting those countries, so celebrated and so little known. Among other curiosities, M. de Cadavène has been fortunate enough to collect above a hundred and fifty gold coins.

Mr. Adams' Lectures .- Our intelligent and instructive lecturer began his course last Friday under rather extraordinary circumstances. Between two o'clock in the afternoon, when all the apparatus was put in order, and seven o'clock, when Mr. Adams came to meet his expectant audience, some evil-doer had contrived to enter the concert-room, abstract the glass of the lantern, break in the face of the orrery's sun, knot up all the cords, and commit other mischief, so as to prevent the lecture from being illustrated in the magnificent manner through which Mr. A. has acquired so deserved a popularity. By much exertion the injuries were in great measure remedied; and the exhibition presented to a sympathising and admiring theatre. A reward of fifty pounds has been offered for the perpetrator of the offence.

Cholera Dissections .- Certain foreigners, of some eminence, have been prosecuting their researches in North Britain, and have met with a degree of success in illustrating the morbid alterations which characterise cholers, much beyond any thing that our own countrymen have accomplished. These appearances were more particularly observed in the semilunar ganglion of nerves, which has been supposed by many to be the seat of the disease. On their arrival in London these researches were repeated before some anatomists of the metropolis. The operator held up the thick-|simplicity, is composed only of a pendulum, a ened and morbid ganglia, when, most unex-pectedly, some person present, of considerable anatomical attainments, doubted whether the object was really the thing sought for, and taking up the knife, removed two or three folds of the peritoneum and a quantity of fatty substance, and arrived at the semi-lunar ganglion in a healthy and normal condition, about three inches from the professor's pathological monster!

Eruption of Vesuvius .- We have a slight eruption at this moment, just sufficient to draw strangers fast from Rome. The lava pours down the cone with great rapidity, and a thick column of smoke hangs over the mountain Private Letter from Naples, 25th Feb.

Cambridge. - The Rev. Mr. Whewell, late Professor of Mineralogy, has signified his desire of presenting to the University his collection of minerals, a selection of books on mineralogy, and the sum of 1001., on condition of the Univeraity providing a room for the reception of the minerals.

Earthquake. - The shock of an earthquake was felt at Crieff, in Scotland, on Thursday week. It was accompanied by a rumbling noise, and so severe as to shake furniture and awaken persons asleep at the time of its occur-

The St. Simoniens. - A great schism has taken place in France among the professors of la Religion Saint-Simonienne. Father 'Rodrigues, and a party with him, have separated from the supreme Father Enfantin, whom they charge with an intention to establish the promiscuous intercourse of the sexes. It must be confessed that there have been of late many passages in Le Globe, the mysticism and voluptuousness of which countenance this accusation. Of course we will not sully our columns by transcribing any of these; but their nature and tendency may easily be guessed by the follow-ing apostrophe, which concludes a rhapsody upon beauty, full of luxurious and exciting images: — "Salut à toi, ravissante Vene, à toi que le Christianisme réprouva sous le nom de Satan!"— M. Chevalier, however, the editor of Le Globe, expresses his perfect confidence in the triumph of the cause; and, relying principally on what he terms "the powerful diversion which women will effect when they feel that they have a religious destination," predicts that in less than four years the whole of France and England will be governed under St. Simonien inspiration!!!

Railways .- The first carriage for the conveyance of passengers on a railway in France, commenced running on the 1st of the present month from St. Etienne to the Loire.

Cholera Morbus. - It is with regret we announce that another ustance, in addition to those noticed in forme seasons, of vessels visited by cholera on their wey from Bombay to China, has occurred on board the H. C. S. Hereford. shire. Several of the crew had suffered, and some died while in Bombay harbour; but the disease became more violent after her departure, particularly during the dull, damp weather that prevailed while on the coast, one or two men falling a sacrifice daily. With the return of fine weather and sunshine, the spirits of the people began to revive, and the disease to disappear. Canton Register.

Ingenious Clock. - The journal of Geneva gives the following description of a curious clock, exhibited in that city, and executed by M. Bianchi, of Verona. This machine, which is clock, exhibited in that city, and executed by M. Bianchi, of Verona. This machine, which is especially remarkable on account of its extreme To ease the laden bosom of its tale.

large wheel, two escapements, and a quadrature. Such are the visible parts. We must, however, suppose that a pinion and a wheel make the communication between the great wheel and the quadrature, though we cannot see them. The pendulum, at each vibration, causes one of the escapements to advance the great wheel one tooth; which, after this movement, has a pause marking the dead second. As there is no metallic moving power to set the machine a-going, we find, on examining what keeps up the motion, that the pendulum, which is almost out of proportion with the clock, descends into a case, and there, at each vibration, the ball or bob, which is furnished with a conductor, approaches alternately two poles, to which voltaic piles supply their portion of electricity. So that the pendulum, when once put in motion, retains it by means of the electricity alternately drawn from the two poles. This machine, which is equally simple and ingenious, is worthy of the attention of the artist. Perhaps other interesting results may be obtained by employing the electric fluid as a moving power, however slight the force such an agent may seem capable of communicating.

Magnetism .- Professor Hansteen, of Christiania, has lately sent to the Imperial Academy of Sciences at Petersburg a lithographic chart of the isodynamic lines for the magnetic power. In a letter to the secretary, the professor states that, during a course of ten years' observation in Christiania, he has found that the entire intensity of the magnetic power decreases in Eu-rope. He concludes from the several facts. that, further eastward, viz. between Tobolsk and Tomsk, this diminution is still greater; that it vanishes at Irkutzk, but again increases in intensity in the eastern parts of Siberia, that is, in Jakutzk, Ochotzk, and Kamtschatka. An investigation into the correctness of this conjecture would undoubtedly be highly interesting. Professor Hansteen has, by means of his invariable magnetic cylinder. determined the degree of intensity in more than three hundred places, most of which are in the Russian empire. A repetition of these observations, after an interval of ten years, at some of the most important points, would, he thinks, if carefully made, shew the changes that had taken place during this interval. Professor H. wishes to see this conjecture investigated by the academy, and indicates the mode of pro-ceeding, which is recommended by his own experience, for giving to those observations the desirable degree of accuracy.
In the MS. journal of a celebrated traveller occurs a birth-day resolve, at the age of sevenand-twenty, which in after-life was exemplarily and successfully kept. It is founded on a strik. ing Italian adage:

Chi di trenta non sà, Di quaranta non fà, E di cinquanta non hà; Mai saprà, mai farà, mai avrà.

"He who at thirty knows nothing, at forty does nothing, and at fifty has nothing, never will know, do, or have any thing.'

" Tell me where is Music?"-In the Morning Herald of Thursday, the advertisement of a piano-forte for sale is addressed " To the proprietors of schools and taverns!"

Having once admitted a foreign poet, there is no resisting his second call.

MUSIC. (Imitated from the German of Jean Paul.) If our hearts, lonesome pris'ners, pining lie
In cell unburst, from whence they vainly try—
Oh, then 'tis thou, by whom the cheerless captives greet,
By whom their distant sighs in lonely union meet!

General Observations.—Only 42-10ths of an inch of rain fell in the whole month, which was less than half of the quantity in any February in the last eighteen years. The weather was generally dull and heavy, with mist or fog: on some nights the fog was remarkably dense, particularly on the 23d. Although the minimum of the thermometer was considerably above those of the last three years, the mean temperature was much below that of the last year, and the average of the month. The mean of the barometer higher than for the last six years in the corresponding month, and the maximum above any since 1837.

There have been few, if any, subjects of antiquarian measures which have excited mese lively curiosity among the world at large than the excessations at Posspati.

The favourable unamer in which the former part of this work was received by the public, has been demonstrated by the rapid sale of two editions. That portion contained an account of almost every thing worthy of notice which had been laid open by the excessations up to the period of its publications in 1819. The present work is intended not only to supply the earliestons of the former, but to describe those more recent discoveries which are by no means inferior in interest or singularity. In reference the new meterials afforded to the Author, it may be noticed, that since the return of the legitimate severeign, more than half of the Forum has been alsered, and the Senaccium or Temple of Sertine, the Chalcidicum, the Temple of Mercury, the Fautheau, the Temple of Verus, that of Festine, the Therman, and immemerable private house, have been disintered.

OF A NEW MONTHLY PERIODICAL, TO BE CALLED THE COMIC MAGAZINE.

Tityre, tn." &c .- Firgil.

In the Magazines we generally find more politics than mirth. A Magazine, in the strict sense of the word, is a repository for combustibles; but, judging from the apparent willingness of those of the present day to accept a heavy article, there seems to be little chance of their testing e-light. There is a line in Shakspeare which proves the immortal bard considered the light matter of the most vital importance. He says, "Pat out the light, and then"—as if it were useless to survive so rash an action—"y put sait by light," evidently meaning to infer that, diverted of the light, the grave became the statist of course; or, perhaps, (and considering the poot's connexion with the butchering line, it is not at all unlikely, he intended to imply that the light and the liver generally went together.

Perfectly coinciding with the Swam of Avon, it is our intention to produce a new light in the literary world, by giving life to a Comic Magazine—a work whose principal festure will be its feet-tiousness—and which, we trust, will in the "getting up" display some vice-shifts.

Ronan's Well, is illustrated by a contain and the surprising felicity of a portrait of Sir Waiter Scott, painted by Horsburgh.

"We chiefly advert to this volume in order to notice the surprising felicity of a portrait of Sir Waiter Scott, painted by John Watson Gordon, and engraved by Horsburgh, which forms the frontispiece. Here the desideratum of a really characteristic and expressive likeness of Sir Waiter is at length sained. We cannot conceive, indeed, any portrait more exactly like, and at the same time so easy and graceful."—Edia. Advertiser, 30 February.

"To us, who have known this illustrious individual from our mutual schoolboy days, there is something deeply affecting in the contemplation of Mr. Watson Gordon's masterly resemblance. It is striking like. Lite is the subject of the subject is now sixty years of the subject of the subject of the subject is now sixty years of the subject of the subj

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

History, Philosophically Illustrated, from the Fall of the Roman Empire to the French Revolution. By G. Miller, D.D. 4 vols. 8vo. London, 1832. Duncan.

THIS is the work of an active and accomplished mind, occupied upon a subject worthy of the highest powers of man.

The reader will naturally desire to know something of the author. Dr. Miller has been long distinguished among the academic names of Ireland. At an early period of life he obtained the highest honour that can be achieved by literary acquirement in his own country-a fellowship in the University of Dublin, a prize to be obtained only by the most various and extensive trial of scientific and general knowledge. In the course of his duties as fellow and tutor, it fell to his lot to give a course of lectures on modern history. The attention which these modern history. The attention which these lectures attracted in the University, induced him to investigate the subject more closely, on his retirement to the living which vacated his fellowship. New views opened, which led him still deeper into this captivating and important study; and, in the course of years, the work had swelled to a considerable number of volumes, which were published and received as a valuable acquisition to the world of literature.

But a vigorous and intelligent mind is always the first to find room for improvement in its own performances. The author undertook the manly task of examining his whole work in detail; of weighing its facts, when the first eagerness of theory had cooled; and even of reducing the colours of his style, when the first enthusiasm of composition had passed away. It is now at length presented to the public entirely rewritten, with its earlier superfluities extinguished, and its original system reinforced by new views, new facts, and new arguments— a new work, the condensed wisdom and indefatigable research of thirty years of learning directed to the noblest purposes of which learning is capable.

In the preface we have a slight sketch of the mode in which the present theory dawned upon

" In looking through those compendiums of general history, which, he thought, might best furnish a plan of orderly connexion, he consulted Puffendorff's Introduction to the History of the Principal Kingdoms and States of Europe; and in perusing this work of a Protestant writer, he was particularly struck by the representation of the spiritual monarchy of Rome, which is very minutely detailed. By this he was led to consider the papacy more distinctly than he had ever done before, as arising naturally out of the earlier condition of modern Europe, and intimately affecting all the relations of the states, which were gradually formed from the ruins of the ancient empire of Rome. Here he seemed to have found a principle of real connexion, and not merely of unnecessary scrupulousness from the possible of real connexion. He called to mind that charge of a professional bias:—"The several to be probable, while we see the whole analogy he had learned to consider communities as notions which have been brought together in state of a peculiar character, intimately connected with the rest, appeared to supply a principle of unity, by which some plan of providential government might, perhaps, be discovered, which should vindicate its truth by its manifest tendency to advance the improvement of mankind. The papacy, which he had been accustomed to consider as an abuse and an evil, might be admitted as furnishing the connecting principle, since he had learned to consider war itself as beneficial, and even as the proper agency by which one community influences another.

This was, however, but the centre of the circle. The states forming the circumference, the satellites of this sullen yet most powerful orb, were still to be examined. France, the predominant military power of Europe, in all ages formidable, restless, and pregnant with mighty influences on the general common-wealth of civilisation, compelled a large portion of his study. The reciprocal influences of this great country, of Germany, and of Italy, opened some admirable results: __ but here we must let the author speak for himself.

"In studying the application of the notion of Mably, the history of the two important treaties of Westphalia and Utrecht came to be examined, the former having mainly adjusted the political relations of Europe in the seventeenth, the latter in the eighteenth century. In this examination two observations presented themselves, by which the plan was at length completely formed. It soon appeared that the adjustments effected by these two treaties were different; the former having constituted Austria the predominant, and France the opposing power; the latter having placed France in the position of Austria, and Great Britain in that of France. It accordingly occurred to the author, that there were two distinct periods in the arrangement of a balance of power, the Austrian and the French, and that the former was but preparatory to the latter. The other observation was, that, though almost all the powers of Europe were concerned in the negotiations of Westphalia, the northern governments were not included in those of Utrecht, and that their interests were separately adjusted, first by the treaty of Oliva, and then by that of Nystadt. It then occurred that, in the progressive formation of the system of Europe, it had resolved itself into two combinations of states, a principal one maintaining a balance of power among its component governments, and an accessory composed of the four governments of Russia, Poland, Denmark, and Sweden, having for its object the aggrandisement theory was then completed. All which was afterwards to be done, was to fill up the outline."

Dr. Miller justifies himself, we think, with moral instruments of the providence of God, and | forming his system, having been received from the consideration of the use and influence of a the most heterogeneous sources...the writing of a Unitarian minister, of dissenters from the Church of England, of a Lutheran jurist, and of a French politician." This we call unnecessary; because, even if the desire to vindicate a particular providence arose from his profession, it was not the less a right desire; and what. ever might be the bias, so long as facts were to decide, the question had but little to do with preposessions, good or evil. But of the merit of his purpose there can be no doubt whatever: " It is his endeavour to shew, that each leading transaction of European history has been a part of a whole, having for its general issue the improvement of human society; and that each leading individual has been an agent, though free and unconscious, in the plan of a wise and beneficent Providence."

The criticisms in our Journal generally keep clear of theological discussions; but we should ill exercise our function if we did not give the fullest credence to the high principle-that the perpetual agency of Providence is busied in sustaining the life and action of nature. This is a declaration sent down from the purest source of wisdom:-" not a sparrow falleth to the ground" unnoticed by the same eye which guides the revolutions of the host of heaven. We know from the same authority, that the heart of man is thus open, and is thus swayed. Why, then, shall we doubt that a calm investigation of those great masses of our fellow-men, empires, influenced alike by external nature and by mind, shall develop some striking evidences of that agency which operates so de-claredly upon both? The conception may be novel, but it may be not the less founded in the frame of things. Instead of the cheerless view of a moral chaos, where all the elements of society are thrown together in eternal confusion, this system summons us to look upon the magnificent and elevating spectacle of a world, hourly forming under a hand of supreme power and wisdom, covering itself with new productiveness, and evolving new capacities for the existence and enjoyment of man. Let the sceptic take refuge, if he will, in the shadows that the very splendours of Providence project from the mixed and various forms of human things; but the true philosopher will find a more philosophic and a more animating impulse in the delight of watching the impress of the Divine hand on the fates of nations—the gradual shaping of the rude material of empire into the first forms of society, the process by which limb and feature are successively moulded into proportion and beauty, the breathing of the breath of life into the image, the sudden glow and energy of its new-born capabilities, of the first of these countries. The plan of the until it receives its commission to go forth as a leader and example to mankind. That the Omnipotent might have cast nations loose, to find their own way through time, is possible, because it is not for us to limit the will of ciple of confusion - while we see this entire physical frame of things ordered with a completeness which constitutes the finest science. From the immense globes of heaven down to the structure of a violet, all is regulation and provision. We are thus actually urged to the conclusion, that the great concerns of manhimself worth all the globes of heaven, and to survive them all-are not left to a caprice and mutability that are not to be found in the very wind. We can have no philosophical doubt, à priori, that a Divine will is traceable in the changes of empires, even upon natural grounds. But to the Christian, and he is the truest philosopher, the evidence is irresistible. He finds it in every page of Revelation. In the Scriptures, all is the declaration and unveiling of providential agency. Prophecy is perpetually fixing her splendid eye upon ages, which to man are yet unborn, and proclaiming with her hallowed voice the fates of kingdoms which are to rise on the ruins of the stately dominations flourishing before the world's eye, and priding themselves on a strength that defies decay.

It has been objected to this doctrine, that it implies a deficiency in the freedom of moral action, and, in fact, lays nations under a species of necessity, which we deny in the case of individuals. To this the obvious reply is, that Providence compels neither man nor nation to pe culiar actions. It leaves them to follow the natural direction of their own impulses, but exercises its power in a merciful and benevolent counteraction of the evil to which the generality of human actions tend. It might almost, without presumption, be affirmed, that the chief agency of Providence, discoverable in its transactions with, at least, our world, is the extraction of good out of evil. The production of direct good it seems to leave to man, and the exercise of his few virtues. The protection of society from the natural results of its many errors and crimes, appears to be the higher and the peculiar agency of Heaven. While virtue, honour, and public spirit, regulate a nation, or a community of nations, all goes on with a tranquillity and completeness of movement which brings it within the general order of nature; but it is the day of confusion which alone requires and therefore alone will exhibit the interposition of a superior hand. It is when public vice, personal ambition, the corruption of the body of the state, brings it down to the verge of the grave, that we see some great providential remedy put to the national lips, which shoots new vigour through its nerves, and sends it forth to resume its place in the ranks of em-pire, chastened and guarded against a more incurable ruin by even the extremity of its

Another of the common objections is, that as nations are made up of individuals, and we confessedly are in the dark with respect to the dealings of Heaven in its judgments with indi-viduals, and are even forbidden to determine those judgments; we have no more power nor right in the case of nations. But here the obvious reply is, that the cases are totally different. We are forbidden to take the judgment of individuals out of the hands of God, because, in the first place, we cannot investigate the heart of man; in the next, there is a future world, where alone the judgment can be wisely formed and, lastly, because the habit would throw the present world into a perpetual fever of presumption, personal inquisition, and personal hostility. But for nations there is no future world. Their course is completed here. We have the and equally lessons to the wisdom of surrounding empires.

It is in this spirit, of following the lights which great events have thrown from time to time on the steps of Providence, that the present author has written his history. His conception has been already given in our extracts from his preface. Examining the progress of every leading nation of Europe, from its first formation, through all the vicissitudes of wealth and poverty, triumph and decay, and developing the causes of their separate catastrophes; he next views them in combination, and elucidates the general principles of the European commonwealth, by their reciprocal actions and impressions. He thus supplies the student and the philosopher with "materials for thinking," collected on the widest scale of human affairs, and at once embracing the most interesting topics, and filling the mind with the safest and the most ennobling contemplations. It is, of course, impossible for us, in our limited space, to detail the various modes by which this result is obtained; but we have no hesitation in saying, that it is obtained with admirable fairness, clearness, and simplicity. One constant cha racteristic of the work ought to give it a tenfold value to every man who feels, that homage to the Divine Wisdom is the highest wisdom of man. The whole work is written in a religious spirit; not a spirit of cant, and that weak and whining attribution of every indifferent thing to the immediate action of the Deity, which so frequently disgraces religion in our days. Of this style there is not a syllable; but we find through every page of the work a sacred sense of the Divine superintendence, which hallows the subject - a deep yet unsuperstitious devotion, which guides the writer through the obliquities and impurities of human action unstained - and a manly zeal for the vindication of the great principles of moral truth, which alone can render history what it was intended to be, a beacon to mankind. The general style of these volumes is honourable to the author's scholarship; it is remarkably distinct, vigorous, and free from superfluous ornament; but in parts, where the subject admitted of the change. t becomes rich and eloquent. The brief sketch of Grattan's oratory, towards the close of the fourth volume, is one of the happiest and most graphic descriptions that we have ever seen of that singularly powerful speaker. On the whole, we entirely congratulate the author and the public on the completion of this performance. What Montesquieu accomplished for the laws of Europe, Dr. Miller has done for its would be more essential to the college lecturer; no general view of facts which is likely to be more valuable to the student; and no elucidation of the mysterious ways of Providence which ought to be more gladly welcomed by the Christian.

Domestic Manners of the Americans. By Mrs. Trollope. 2 vols. 12mo. London, 1832. Whittaker and Co.

WE have not for some time met with volumes that bore more decidedly the stamp of feminine authorship: lively, pleasant, gossiping — but full of prejudices, and taking only a look at one side of the picture. A woman always judges by her feelings, and these feelings are often interested or disgusted by slight causeshence, impartiality is the rarest of female mebeginning and the end, their whole existence rits; and most assuredly it is one not to be they had all had ague in 'the fall;' but she before our eyes. They have no fine internal found in these volumes. Mrs. Trollope is a second contented, and proud of her independconfiguration to defy the eyes of man. And | fair specimen of the style in which a European their rise, their progress, and their fall, are all opinion is formed, and a judgment pronounced, on America. An individual who has talked about liberty (and it is amazing how soon we can talk ourselves into a fever) - dreamed dreams of equality-and is theoretic about the rights of man and of woman - sets off for America, expecting to find it a complete Utopia. Of course these expectations - like all air-castles, of which imagination, not reason, is the architect—are disappointed; and then off flies the castle-builder to the other ex-treme, and can see no advantages, and make no allowances. This is precisely Mrs. Tro-lope's case. We can well imagine an English lady, accustomed to all the refinements and comforts of an English life and home, extremely annoyed at the wants, the privations, the disagreeables, she must necessarily have endured in a remote American settlement; but we maintain that these have taken an undue hold upon the mind, when they blind her to the energy, the industry, the improvement, going on rapidly on every side. And we must own it is not such a crime in our eves as it is in hers, that the small American farmer and his family breakfast on beefsteaks and onions. Why, it is not so very long ago since our own Queen Elizabeth, of glorious memory, and all her maids of honour, did the same. of the Transatlantic agriculturist is no fluteplaying, sheep-keeping, pastoral dream of rural felicity; but a life of constant and hard labour; and necessities come before luxuries. Our own standard of habit and enjoyment is a false criterion for that of others:-but we will quote a passage to illustrate our meaning.

"We visited one farm which interested us particularly from its wild and lonely situation, and from the entire dependence of the inhabitants upon their own resources. It was a partial clearing in the very heart of the forest. The that a high ladder was necessary to enter the front door, while the back one opened against the hill-side; at the foot of this sudden eminence ran a clear stream, whose bed had been deepened into a little reservoir, just opposite the house. A noble field of Indian corn stretched away into the forest on one side, and a few half-cleared acres, with a shed or two upon them, occupied the other, giving accommodation to cows, horses, pigs, and chickens innumerable.

Immediately before the house was a small potato-garden, with a few peach and apple-trees. The house was built of logs, and consisted of two rooms, besides a little shanty or lean-to, that was used as a kitchen. Both rooms were comfortably furnished with good beds, drawers, history. We know of no text-book which &c. The farmer's wife, and a young woman who looked like her sister, were spinning, and three little children were playing about. woman told me that they spun and wove all the cotton and wootlen garments of the family, and knit all the stockings; her husband, though not a shoe-maker by trade, made all the shoes. She manufactured all the soap and candles they used, and prepared her sugar from the sugar-trees on their farm. All she wanted with money, she said, was to buy coffee, tea, and whisky, and she could 'get enough any day by sending a batch of butter and chicken to market.' They used no wheat, nor sold any of their corn, which, though it appeared a very large quantity, was not more than they required to make their bread and cakes of various kinds, and to feed all their live stock during the winter. She did not look in health, and said ence; though it was in somewhat a mournful, to be naturalised here. Mr. Hallock, of New having set out on her crusade with inflamed accent that she said. 'Tis strange to us to see company: I expect the sun may rise and set a hundred times before I shall see another human that does not belong to the family.' I have been minute in the description of this forest farm, as I think it the best specimen I saw of the back-wood's independence, of which so much is said in America. These people were indeed independent, Robinson Crusoe was hardly more so, and they eat and drink abundantly; but yet it seemed to me that there was something awful and almost unnatural in their loneliness. No village-bell ever summoned them to prayer, where they might meet the friendly greeting of their fellow-men. When they die, no spot sacred by ancient reverence will receive their bones - Religion will not breathe her sweet and solemn farewell upon their grave; the husband or the father will dig the pit that is to hold them beneath the nearest tree; he will himself deposit them within it, and the wind that whispers through the boughs will be their only requiem. But then they pay neither taxes nor tithes, are never expected to pull off a hat or to make a curtsy, and will live and die without hearing or uttering the dreadful words, 'God save the king!"

Now, the miseries so pathetically set forth in the concluding passage are purely imagina-tive: that to which people have never been accustomed, they cannot miss; and the small fact of not being buried in a churchyard, is scarcely an overwhelming balance against a life of exertion and of independence. The following statement relative to American literature is a striking instance of the unfair bias which our author allows her prepossession against the Americans to give to her statements:-

" They are great novel-readers, but the market is chiefly furnished by England. They have, however, a few very good native novels.

Mr. Flint's 'Francis Berrian' is delightful. There is a vigour and freshness in his writing that is exactly in accordance with what one looks for in the literature of a new country; and yet, strange to say, it is exactly what is most wanting in that of America. It appeared to me that the style of their imaginative compositions was almost always affected and inflated. Even in treating their great national subject of romance, the Indians, they are seldom either powerful or original. A few well-known general features, moral and physical, are presented over and over again in all their Indian stories, till in reading them you lose all sense of individual character. Mr. Flint's 'History of the Mississippi Valley' is a work of great interest, and information, and will, I hope, in time, find its way to England, where I think it is much more likely to be appreciated than in America. Dr. Channing is a writer too well known in England to require my testimony to his great ability. As a preacher, he has, perhaps, hardly a rival any where. This gentleman is a Unitarian; and I was informed by several persons well acquainted with the literary characters of the country, that nearly all their distinguished men were of this persuasion. Mr. Pierpoint is a very eloquent preacher and a sweet poet. His works are not so well known among us as they ought to be. Mr. Everett has written some beautiful lines; and if I may judge from the specimens of his speeches, as preserved in the volumes entitled ' Eloquence of the United States,' I should say that he shone more as a poet than an orator. But American fame has led to take a harsher view in consequence of decided otherwise. Mr. M. Flint, of Louisiana, has published a volume of poems which ought Burns' festival.

York, has much facility of versification, and is greatly in fashion as a drawing-room poet; but I think he has somewhat too much respect for himself, and too little for his readers. It is, I think, Mr. Bryant who ranks highest as the poet of the Union. This is too lofty an eminence for me to attack; besides, 'I am of another parish,' and therefore, perhaps, no very fair judge. From miscellaneous poetry I made a great many extracts; but upon returning to them for transcription, I thought that ill-nature and dulness, ('oh ill-matched pair!') would be more served by their insertion than wholesome criticism."
